[SHIMEI. One of Saul's relatives, who cursed David, and who was killed by order of Solomon. 2 Sam. xvi. 5-13; xix. 16-23; 1 Kings ii. 8, 9, 36-46.—Others of this name are mentioned, 1 Chron. iii. 19; iv. 26, 27; v. 4; vi. 17, 42; xxiii. 7, 9, 10; xxv. 17; xxvii. 27; 2 Chron. xxix. 14; xxxi. 12, 18; Ezra x. 23; Esther ii. 5; Zech. xii. 13.]

SHINAR, a province of Babylonia, where men undertook to build the tower of Babel. Gen. xi. 2; x. 10. Calneh was built in this country. Amraphel was King of Shinar in the days of Abraham. Gen. xiv. 1. See BABYLON.

[SHIP. אֵלֶּיךָ, 1 Kings ix. 26: Prov. xxx. 19: Isa. xxxiii. 21: Jonah i. 3. Ναῦς, Acts xxvii. 41. Πλοῖον is applied to a merchantman, Acts xxvii. 2, 6, 10, 11, 37, 44: James iii. 4; or to a fishing-smack, Luke v. 2-12: John vi. 17-21. Πλοῖον, a diminutive of πλοῖον, is rendered a "small ship," a "boat," Mark iii. 9; iv. 36: John vi. 22, 23. The Phenicians were pioneers in navigation. The ships of Tarshish were the most famous of antiquity. 2 Chron. ix.

21. See TARSHISH. The ships of the ancients, like those of the Northmen, were steered by two paddle-rudders, one on each quarter: hence Luke speaks of the bands of the rudders, πηδαζίων, Acts xxvii. 40. There was one large mast, with a large sail, which concentrated the strain on one part of the vessel, and rendered her peculiarly liable to leakage. To prevent this there were under-girders, or ropes passed round the hull, called helps, Acts xxvii. 17. Some of the ancient vessels must have been from five hundred to one thousand tons burthen: two hundred and seventy-six persons were on board the ship in which Paul was wrecked, and six hundred on board that from which Josephus escaped. Yet large as they were, on account of their clumsy build and rig they could not sail nearer the wind than within seven points, nor more than about seven knots an hour, with a fair wind. The prow was ornamented by the insigne giving name to the ship: the stern also had various ornaments, among which was the image of the tutelary god. The anchors were usually thrown out at the prow; but when the ship was driving before the wind, and in danger of foundering, they were cast out at the stern. Four anchors were dropped from the stern of the ship in which Paul was wrecked. Lord Nelson, whose ships anchored in this way at Copenhagen, stated that on the morning of the battle he had been reading the chapter, Acts xxvii., which records this fact. The largest and strongest anchor, the "last hope" of the ship, was called lepā, the sacred anchor; hence Paul's allusion, Heb. vi. 19. For a minute account of the ships and navigation of the ancients, with illustrative engravings, see Smith's "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities," edited by Dr. Anthon, and Conybeare and Howson's "Life and Epistles of St. Paul."]

SHISHAK, King of Egypt, declared war against Rehoboam in the fifth year of the reign of that prince. 2 Chron. xii. 2, 3, etc. This Shishak, according to Sir Isaac Newton, was the greatest conqueror and the most celebrated hero of all antiquity, being the son of Ammon, or the Egyptian Jupiter, and known to the Greeks by the name of Bacchus, Osiris, and Hercules; was the Belus of the Chaldeans, and the Mars or Mavors of the Thracians, etc. He made great conquests in India, Assyria, Media, Scythia, Phenicia, Syria, Judea, etc. His army was at last routed in Greece by Perseus; which, with other circumstances, compelled him to return home. [On the south side of a temple at Thebes is an inscription recording the triumphs of Shishak. More than thirty nations, and among them the Jews, appear as captives. Champollion and others decipher "the kingdom of Judah" in the hieroglyphics. The names of "the fenced cities" taken by him, 2 Chron. xii. 2-4, are also found on the monuments.]

SHITTIM, SITTIM, SITTAH, שִׁטִּים, Exod. xxv. 5, 10, 18, 23, 28; xxvi. 26, 32, 37 xxvii. 1, 6; xxx. 5; xxxv. 7, 24; xxxvi. 20, 31, 36; xxxvii. 1, 4, 10, 15, 25, 28; xxxviii. 1, 6: Deut. x. 3: Isaiah xli. 19. What particular species of wood this is, interpreters are not agreed. The LXX. render ἀσηπτα ξύλα, incorruptible wood. St. Jerome says, the shittim-

wood grows in the deserts of Arabia, and is like white thorn, as to its color and leaves; but the tree is so large as to furnish very long planks. The wood is hard, tough, smooth, and extremely beautiful. It is thought that this wood is the black acacia, because that, it is said, is the most common tree growing in the deserts of Arabia; and agrees with what the Scriptures say of the shittim-wood. The acacia vera grows abundantly in Egypt, in places far from the sea; in the mountains of Sinai, near the Red Sea, and in the deserts. It is of the size of a large mulberry tree. The spreading branches and larger limbs are armed with thorns which grow three together; the bark is rough; the leaves are oblong, and stand opposite each other; the flowers, though sometimes white, are generally of a bright yellow; and the fruit, which resembles a bean, is contained in pods like those of the lupin. "The acacia tree," says Dr. Shaw, "being by much the largest and most common tree in these deserts, Arabia Petræa, we have some reason to conjecture that the shittim-wood was the wood of the acacia; especially as its flowers are of an excellent smell, for the shittah tree is, in Isaiah xli. 19, joined with the myrtle and other fragrant shrubs." [Dr. Olin says, "The Arabian acacia is full of thorns. It attains to no great height, has a spreading top, and the largest which I have seen do not exceed a foot in diameter. The timber is white, and very solid and durable; indeed, it seems quite incorruptible. It was probably the shittim-wood of the Scriptures, of which the ark and tabernacle were constructed."]

[SHITTIM. The last-encampment of the Israelites, Num. xxv. 1, called ABEL-SHITTIM, Num. xxxiii. 49.—The VALLEY OF SHITTIM, Joel iii. 18, seems to have been west of the Jordan.]

[SHOCH, 1 Sam. xvii. 1. Compare Joshua xv. 35; 2 Chron. xi. 7. See MAON.]

SHOES. To put off the shoes from one's feet, was an act of reverence to the Divine majesty of God. Exod. iii. 5. It was likewise a sign of mourning and humiliation. David went up the ascent of Mount Olivet barefoot. 2 Sam. xv. 30; Isa. xx. 2, 4; Ezek. xxiv. 17. See SANDAL.

[SHOSHANNIM. This word in the titles of Psalms xlv. and lxix., is thought by some to mean an instrument of six strings, as it comes from שש, six. Others consider it the plural of shushan, a lily, so called from its six petals, and refer it to a lily-shaped instrument, or to a tune so called—or to the pleasant subject of the psalm, which applies better to Psalm xlv. than to Psalm lxix. SHUSHAN-EDUTH, Ps. lx., title, and SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH, Psalm lxxx., title, are rendered lily, and lilies, of the testimony.]

SHOULDER. To give or lend the shoulder for the bearing of a burden, signifies to submit to servitude. "Issachar bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute." Gen. xlix. 15. And Isaiah, (x. 27,) comforting Israel with the promise of deliverance from Assyria, says, "His burden shall be taken away from off thy shoulder." The Scripture calls that a rebellious shoulder, a withdrawing shoulder, which will not submit to the yoke; and to bear it together with joint consent, is termed "serving with one shoulder."

To bear any thing upon the shoulder, is to sustain it, and this is applied to government and authority. Thus Messiah was to bear the government upon his shoulder: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor," etc., Isa. ix. 6; and God promises Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, to give him the key of the house of David, and to lay it upon his shoulder; "so he shall open, and none shall shut, and he shall shut, and none shall open;" that is, the sole authority shall rest upon him. [Isa. xxii. 20–22.]

[SHOVEL. שוֹבֵל, rendered shovel, Isa. xxx. 24, derived from שוּב, seems to mean the wind; and שוֹבֵר, rendered fan, is the shovel used in winnowing. The orientals, as travellers tell us, still winnow their grain by throwing it up with shovels against the wind. See FAN.]

[SHROVE-TUESDAY. The day before Ash-Wednesday, so called from shrive, to confess, because there was formerly a general confession of sins to the priest on that day, preparatory to Lent. It afterward became a season of hilarity. See CARNIVAL.]

[SHULAMITE. The bride of Solomon; the word being the feminine form of his name. Cant. vi. 13.]

[SHUNEM. A town of Issachar, called Sulem by Eusebius and Jerome, and located by them five Roman miles south of Mount Tabor. The Crusaders called it Suna. It is now called Sôlam, a small, dirty village, on a steep slope, with a fountain yielding scarcely water enough for the inhabitants. Josh. xix. 18; 1 Sam. xxviii. 4; 1 Kings i. 3; 2 Kings iv. 8–37.]

[SHUR. The wilderness into which the Israelites entered after they crossed the Red Sea. It is now called Sudr. Dr. Durbin describes it as a gravelly district, between the black mural range of Gebal Rehab and the sea, crossed transversely by dry beds of torrents, in which are a few stunted shrubs. It is inhabited by about forty families of Terabin Arabs. Gen. xvi. 7; xxv. 18; Exod. xv. 22.]

SHUSHAN, or SUSA, the ancient capital of Persia, seated on the river Ulai, the modern Abzal. After the union of the kingdoms of Media and Persia by Cyrus, Susa was made the winter residence of the kings of Persia, from its southern position, and the shelter afforded by a range of mountains on the north and east, which rendered the heat insupportable in the summer season; while Ecbatana, in Media, from its greater elevation, and more northern situation, was preferred at this season, as being more cool and agreeable. Here the transactions occurred related in the book of Esther. Here, also, Daniel had the vision of the ram with two horns, and the goat with one horn, etc., in the third year of Belshazzar's reign. Susa was situated in the ancient province of Elam, or Elymais, called also Susiana, and now forming a part of Kuzestan. It has for several hundred years, like Babylon, been reduced to a heap of undistinguished ruins. Mr. Kinner says, "About seven or eight miles to the west of Dezphoul commence the ruins of Shus, stretching not less, perhaps, than twelve miles from one extremity to the other. They extend as far as the eastern bank of the Kerah, occupying an immense space between that river and the Abzal; and, like the ruins of Ctesiphon, Babylon, and Kufa, consist of hillocks of earth and rubbish, covered with broken pieces of brick and colored tile. The largest and most remarkable of these mounds stand at the distance of about two miles from the Kerah. The first is, at the lowest computation, a mile in circumference, and nearly a hundred feet in height; and the other, although not quite so high, is double the circuit of the former. These mounds bear some resemblance to the pyramids of Babylon, with this difference, that, instead of being entirely made of brick, they are formed of clay and pieces of tile, with irregular layers of brick and mortar, five or six feet in thickness, to serve, it should seem, as a kind of prop to the mass. Large blocks of marble, covered with hieroglyphics, are not unfrequently here discovered by the Arabs when digging in search of hidden treasure; and at the foot of the most elevated of the pyramids stands the tomb of Daniel, a small and apparently a modern building, erected on the spot where the relics of that prophet are believed to rest. The site of the city of Shus is now a gloomy wilderness, infested by lions, hyenas, and other beasts of prey. The dread of these furious animals compelled Mr. Monteith and myself to take shelter for the night within the walls that encompass Daniel's tomb." Of this tomb Sir John Malcom observes, that "it is a small building, but sufficient to shelter some dervishes who watch the remains of the prophet, and are supported by the alms of pious pilgrims who visit the holy sepulchre. These dervishes are now the only inhabitants of Susa, and every species of wild beast roams at large over that spot on which some of the proudest palaces ever raised by human art once stood." He also observes, respecting the authenticity of this tomb, that "although the building at the tomb of Daniel be comparatively modern, nothing could have led to its being built where it is, but a belief that this was the real site of the prophet's sepulchre."

[SHUTTLE. The instrument used for throwing the thread of the woof across the warp. אָר is rendered "beam" in Judg. xvi. 14; Parkhurst suggests loom: "shuttle," in Job vii. 6; Schultens suggests yarn—"Slighter than yarn are my days;" "weaver," in Isa. xxxviii. 12; Parkhurst suggests shuttle—"I have hurried through my life as a shuttle." It is certain the shuttle, κερκὴς, was not unknown to the ancients. Homer, Il. xxii. 440, 448; Odys. v. 62, speaks of weaving, and specifies the shuttle and web.]

[SIBMAH. A place celebrated for its vines, located by Jerome half a mile from Heshbon. Isa. xvi. 8.]

[SIBYLLINE ORACLES. Eight volumes said to have been written on leaves, by some ten women who lived before Christ, in different parts of Persia, Greece, and Italy. They pretend to predict the fortunes of states, etc. They are full of contemptible fables, composed in bad poetry, and some of them bear internal evidence that they were written later than one hundred and sixty-nine years after Christ. As Augustus collected sibylline oracles from various countries, it is likely some Hebrew predictions of Christ were mingled in the heterogeneous mass. Celsus mentions a sect of Christians called Sibyllists; but Origen says they were so called in contempt by other Christians, who would not allow the sibyl to have been a prophetess. Justin Martyr, in his First Apology, speaks of these oracles as genuine and inspired; and they were so considered by many in the dark ages, e. g., Dies iræ.]

[SICKLE. דֶּרֶשׁ, Deut. xvi. 9; xxiii. 25, (26, Heb.), is derived from roots signifying to separate, and draw back. It is called בִּזְלָה, Jer. i. 16, Joel iii. 13, from its circular form and motion, which, from Egyptian monuments, appear to have been nearly the same in ancient as in modern times. Ἀπέτρανον, Mark iv. 29: Rev. xiv. 14-19.]

[SIDDIM. A fertile vale, which was overwhelmed by the Dead Sea. Gen. xiv. 3.]

SIDON, or ZIDON, a celebrated city and port of Phenicia, and one of the most ancient cities in the world, as it is supposed to have been founded by Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan, which will carry it up to above two thousand years before Christ. [Gen. x. 15.] But if it was founded by Sidon, his descendants were driven out by a body of Phenician colonists, or Cushim, from the east; who are supposed either to have given it its name, or to have retained the old one in compliment to their god Siton, or Dagon. Its inhabitants appear to have early acquired a preëminence in arts, manufactures, and commerce; and from their superior skill in hewing timber, by which must be understood their cutting it out and preparing it for building, as well as the mere act of felling it, Sidonian workmen were hired by Solomon to prepare the wood for the building of his temple. [1 Kings v. 6.] The Sidonians are said to have been the first manufacturers of glass; and Homer often speaks of them as excelling in many useful and ingenious arts, giving them the title of Πολυδαίδαλοι. Add to this, they were, if not the first shipwrights and navigators, the first who ventured beyond their own coasts, and in those early ages engrossed the greatest part of the then commerce of the world. The natural result of these exclusive advantages to the inhabitants of Sidon was a high degree of wealth and prosperity; and, content with the riches which their trade and manufactures brought them, they lived in ease and luxury, trusting the defence of their city and property, like the Tyrians after them, to hired troops; so that to live in ease and security is said in Scripture to be after the manner of the Sidonians. [Judges xviii. 7.] In all these respects, however, Sidon was totally eclipsed by her neighbor and rival, Tyre, whose more enterprising inhabitants pushed their commercial dealings to the extremities of the known world, raised their city to a rank in power and opulence unknown before, and converted it into a luxurious metropolis, and the emporium of the produce of all nations. After the subversion of the Grecian empire by the Romans, Sidon fell into the hands of the latter; who, to put an end to the frequent revolt of the inhabitants, deprived it of its freedom. It then fell successively under the power of the Saracens, the Seljukian Turks, and the sultans of Egypt, who, in 1289, that they might never more afford shelter to the Christians, destroyed both it and Tyre. But it again somewhat revived, and has ever since been in the possession of the Ottoman Turks.

[Sidon is spoken of, Gen. x. 19; xlix. 13: Josh. xix. 28: Judges i. 31; x. 12: Ezra iii. 7: Isa. xxiii. 2: Jer. xxv. 22: Ezek. xxvii. 8; xxviii. 21-23: Matt. xv. 21: Mark iii. 8: Acts xxvii. 3. Interesting "Historical Notices" of Sidon are given in Dr. Robinson's "Researches," sec. xvi. Some ruins of "Great Zidon" are pointed out about two miles inland from the modern city. Saida is situated on the northern side of the promontory; is badly laid out, but contains some good houses, and six hotels. Beyrout, which is sixteen miles north, has taken away a great deal of its trade; yet it exports some silk, cotton, nutgalls, oil, and fruit. A wall, running across the peninsula, encloses it on the land side. On the south is a citadel, said to have been built by Louis IX., in 1253. At the north, on a rock in the sea, is another castle, built by the Crusaders. The city was injured by an earthquake in 1837, and by the bombardment in 1840, when the troops of Mehemet Ali were expelled; but it still contains some six thousand inhabitants, two thirds Mussulmans, one eighth Jews, the rest Greek Catholics, Maronites, and Arab Greeks.]

[SIEVE. Amos ix. 9. Compare Luke xxii. 31. The ancients made sieves of papyrus, or rushes. The Gauls made them of horse-hair.]

SIGN. This word is used in the sense of token and pledge; as, when the Lord gave to Noah the rainbow as a sign of his covenant, Gen. ix. 12, 13; and when he appointed to Abraham the use of circumcision as the seal of the covenant he had made with him and his posterity. Gen. xvii. 11. Sign is also put for a miracle: "Thou shalt do these signs and wonders in the midst of Egypt." Exodus iv. 7-9, etc. A sign or token is often put for the proof or evidence of a thing: for example, "This shall be a token or sign unto thee that I have sent thee." Exod. iii. 12. "Show me a sign that thou talkest with me," Judg. vi. 17; that is, a proof. "What shall be the sign," or evidence, "that the Lord will heal me?" 2 Kings xx. 8. This acceptance agrees with the first above mentioned; as also what is said in Gen. iv. 15, "And the Lord set a mark or sign upon Cain;" he gave him a pledge that his life should not be taken away. The signs of heaven, and the signs of the magicians, are the phenomena of the heavens and the impostures of magicians, which they made use of for the purposes of deception: "The Lord frustrateth the tokens or signs of the liars, and maketh diviners mad." Isaiah xlv. 25. "Be not dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the heathen are dismayed at them." Jer. x. 2. To be a sign was further to be a type, or prediction, of what should happen. Thus the prophet Isaiah, viii. 18, "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel." See also Ezek. iv. 3.

[SIGNET. See SEAL.]

[SIHOR. See AMORITES.]

[SIHOR. Some consider Sihor the Brook Be-sor, 1 Sam. xxx. 9, which enters the Mediterranean below Gaza: others make it a rivulet which empties into the Sirbonic Lake: others, the

Wâdy-el-'Arish, which has its origin in the water-shed of the peninsula of Sinai, and empties into the Mediterranean at el-'Arish, the ancient Rhinocorura. This last opinion is countenanced by the rendering of the LXX. in Isa. xxvii. 12. But Nachal Mitzraim, "the stream of Egypt," which we generally render "the River of Egypt," they render "the Torrent of Egypt," in Num. xxxiv. 5: Josh. xv. 47: 2 Kings xxiv. 7: 2 Chron. vii. 8—the "Gulf of Egypt," Josh. xv. 4—the "River of Egypt," 1 Kings viii. 65, which is also their rendering of Nahar Mitzraim in Gen. xv. 18. They render Sihor, borders, in 1 Chron. xiii. 5—Geon, Jer. ii. 18—merchants, Isa. xxiii. 3—uninhabited land, Josh. xiii. 3. These various renderings show that they had no definite understanding in regard to the stream designated by the terms in question. It seems clear that Sihor and the River of Egypt are identical, and that the Sihor in Josh. xiii. 3 must be identified with the River, Nahar, of Egypt, in Gen. xv. 18, and this with the River, Nachal, of Egypt, spoken of in other places. If so, then we can hardly escape the conclusion of Gesenius, Hales, Shaw, Keith, and others, that this river is the Nile, or its Pelusiac branch. Being spoken of as the permanent boundary of the Land of Promise on the south-west, in the same way as the Euphrates is spoken of as its boundary on the east, it would seem incongruous to make it a mere rivulet, or valley in the desert, in which there is no water the greater part of the year. Why should an insignificant wâdy, like the 'Arish, be called the River of Egypt? Had Egypt no river? and did the desert between the Pelusiac branch of the Nile and the 'Arish properly belong to Egypt, that this valley should be called by its name? That desert belonged to Arabia, but it may have been comprehended in the Promised Land, as the country near the Euphrates belonged to Arabia, yet it was included within the Abrahamic covenant. If the Israelites never inhabited these regions, it was because they did not need them, or dispossessed themselves by their transgressions; but it is certain that Solomon did extend at least a nominal sovereignty over all the territory between these two great rivers. It is observable, too, that the Targum, in 1 Chron. xiii. 5, renders Sihor the Nile. Sihor means black, and may well designate the Nile on account of the dark color of its waters during its swell. Hence the name by which it was known among various nations: the Greek and Latin Melas and Melo, the Hindoo Cali, the Egyptian Okeames, all signifying black. According to Pliny, Solinus, and Dionysius, it was called Siris, "its Ethiopic name, derived from Sihor or Sihir." Indeed, the word Nile itself is derived by many from the Hebrew Nachal, the river: hence the Targums render it Nilus in Num. xxxiv. 5. See NILE.]

SILAS, or SILVANUS, was, according to St. Luke, Acts xv. 22, one of the "chief men among the brethren," which makes it probable that he was of the number of the seventy disciples. When a dispute was raised at Antioch about the observation of the legal ceremonies, they chose Paul, Barnabas, Judas, and Silas to go to Jerusalem to advise with the apostles concerning this question. He is thought to be the same Silas who is mentioned by the name of Silvanus in the title of the two Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians. St. Peter sent his first Epistle by him from Rome, wherein he styles him "a faithful brother." Silas joined himself to St. Paul; and after Saul and Barnabas had parted on account of John Mark, Acts xv. 37-41, Silas followed St. Paul, and went with him to visit the churches of Syria and Cilicia.

SILENCE. This word not only signifies to refrain from speaking, but also, in the style of the Hebrews, it is taken for, "to be quiet, to remain immovable;" as, for example, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon;" in Hebrew, be silent. "And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed," Josh. x. 12, 13, or were silent, at the commandment of Joshua.

SILK. שרש. [Ezek. xvi. 10, 13.] As the word which is rendered "silk" in our version more probably meant cotton, or rather muslin, it is doubtful whether silk is mentioned expressly in the Scripture, unless, perhaps, in Isaiah xix. 9, where we find the Hebrew word שריון, from שרק, yellowish, tawny; which is generally the natural color of raw silk; hence the Latin sericum; or it may be from the Seres, a nation whence the Greeks and Romans first obtained the article silk. Calmet remarks, that the ancient Greeks and Romans had but little knowledge of the nature of silk. The Seres communicated their silk to the Persians, from whom it passed to the Greeks, and from them to the Romans. But the Persians and orientals for a long time kept the secret of manufacturing it among themselves. Silk was first brought into Greece after Alexander's conquest of Persia, and came into Italy during the flourishing times of the Roman empire, but was long so dear in all these parts as to be worth its weight in gold. At length the Emperor Justinian, who died in the year 365, by means of two monks whom he sent into India for that purpose, procured great quantities of silk-worms' eggs to be brought to Constantinople, and from these have sprung all the silk-worms and all the silk trade that have been since in Europe. See FLAX.

SILOAH, the same as Siloam, Neh. iii. 15: Luke xiii. 4: a fountain under the walls of Jerusalem, toward the east, between the city and the brook Kidron, perhaps the same with En-rogel. Near this was a tower, Luke xiii. 4. [But see EN-ROGEL and POOL.]

SILVER, כסף, Gen. xx. 16; ἀργύριον, 1 Pet. i. 18: Acts iii. 6; xx. 33: a well-known metal, of a white shining color, next in value to gold. It does not appear to have been in use before the deluge; at least, Moses says nothing of it; he speaks only of the metals brass and iron, Gen. iv. 22. But in Abraham's time it was become common, and traffic was carried on with it. Gen. xxiii. 2, 15. Yet it was not then coined, but was only in bars or ingots, and in commerce was always weighed. [The phrase, pieces of silver, or silverlings, as our version reads, Isa. vii. 23, denotes shekels. Gen. xxxvii. 28; xlv. 22: Deut. xxii. 19, 29: Judg. xvii. 10: Zech. xi. 12, 13: Matt. xxvii. 3-10. Some think Greek drachmae are meant in Acts xix. 19. Silver denotes money in general in 1 Chron. xxi. 22, 24, Heb.: Matt. xxv. 18, 27: Luke ix. 3, Gr.; also in Matt. x.

9, James v. 3, where ἀργυρος is used, as it is in 1 Cor. iii. 12, where it denotes something valuable. Compare Rev. xviii. 12.—The silver cord, Eccl. xii. 6, is supposed to be the spinal marrow, from its form, color, and value.]

SIMEON, son of Jacob and Leah, was born A. M. 2247. Gen. xxix. 33; xxxiv. 25. Jacob, on his death-bed, showed his indignation against Simeon and Levi for their cruelty to the Shechemites, Gen. xlix. 5: "I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." And in effect these two tribes were scattered in Israel. As to Levi, he never had any fixed lot or portion; and Simeon received only a canton that was dismembered from the tribe of Judah, Joshua xix. 1, etc., and some other lands they went to conquer in the mountains of Seir and the desert of Gedor. 1 Chron. iv. 27, 39, 42.]

SIMEON, a holy man, who was at Jerusalem, full of the Holy Ghost, and expecting the redemption of Israel. Luke ii. 25, 26, etc. The Holy Ghost had assured him that he should not die before he had seen the Christ of the Lord; he therefore came into the temple, prompted by inspiration, just at the time when Joseph and Mary presented Jesus Christ there, in obedience to the law. Simeon took the child into his arms, gave thanks to God, and then blessed Joseph and Mary. It is believed, with good reason, that he died soon after he had given his testimony to Jesus Christ. Some have conjectured that Simeon, who received Jesus Christ into his arms, was the same as Simeon the Just, the son of Hillel, and master of Gamaliel, whose disciple St. Paul was. See SANHEDRIM.

[SIMEON NIGER. See NIGER.]

SIMON MACCABÆUS, surnamed Thossi, son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas and Jonathan. He was chief prince and pontiff of the Jews from A. M. 3860 to 3869, and was succeeded by John Hyrcanus. For the particulars of his life and transactions, see 1 Macc. ii. 65; v. 17; x. 74-82; xii. 33, etc.; xiii. 1, etc.; xiv. 4, etc.; xv. 1, etc.

SIMON, brother of our Lord, Matt. xiii. 55: Mark vi. 3; that is to say, his cousin-german, being son of Mary, sister to the Holy Virgin. He is thought to be the same with Simeon, Bishop of Jerusalem, and son of Cleopas.

[SIMON PETER. He is called Symeon, Acts xv. 14: 2 Peter i. 1, Gr. See PETER.]

SIMON, THE CANAANITE, an apostle of Jesus Christ. It is doubtful whether the name of Canaanite was derived to him from the city Cana in Galilee, or whether it should not be taken according to its signification in the Hebrew, by deriving it from the root kana, "to be zealous;" and this is the opinion of some learned men. See Luke vi. 15, Acts i. 13, where he is surnamed Zelotes; see also Matt. x. 4: Mark iii. 18.

[SIMON. A Pharisee. Luke vii. 36-50.]

[SIMON THE LEPER. One who had probably been cured of the leprosy by Christ. Matt. xxvi. 6.]

[SIMON. A tanner of Joppa. Acts x. 6.]

SIMON MAGUS. Of this heretic, or rather father of heresy, Dr. Burton gives the following account:—Justin Martyr, about A. D. 140, presented a defence of Christianity to the Emperor Antoninus Pius, in which he mentions, as a well-known fact, that Simon, a native of Gittum, a village in Samaria, came to Rome in the reign of Claudius, was looked upon there as a god, and had a statue erected to him, with a Latin inscription, in the river Tiber, between the two bridges. Justin adds, that nearly all the Samaritans, and a few also in other nations, acknowledged and worshipped him as the supreme God. There is in this passage such a minute detail, such a confident appeal to the emperor's own knowledge of what the apologist was saying, that we can hardly suppose the story to be false, when not only the emperor but every person in Rome would have been able to detect it. I would observe, also, that Justin Martyr was himself a native of Samaria; hence he was able to name the very place where Simon was born; and when he says, in his second defence, which was presented a few years later, "I have despised the impious and false doctrine of Simon which is in my country;" when we see the shame which he felt at the name of Christians being assumed by the followers of that impostor; we can never believe that he would have countenanced the story, if the truth of it had not been notorious, much less would he have given to his own country the disgrace of originating the evil.

Simon Magus was a native of Gittum, a town in Samaria; and it is stated in a suspicious document of ancient though doubtful date, that he studied for some time at Alexandria. Concerning the time of his birth, and of his first rising into notice, little can now be known. The only contemporary document which mentions him is the Acts of the Apostles; and we there read, that when Philip the deacon preached the gospel in Samaria after the death of Stephen, "there was a certain man, called Simon, which before-time in the same city used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one; to whom they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is the great power of God. And to him they had regard, because that of long time he had bewitched them with sorceries." Acts viii. 9-11. According to my calculation, the death of Stephen happened in the same year with the crucifixion of our Lord; and it appears from the passage now quoted, that Simon's celebrity had begun some time before. We are then told that "Simon himself believed also; and when he was baptized, he continued with Philip, and wondered, beholding the miracles and signs which were done." Acts viii. 13. I need not mention how he shortly fell away from the faith which he had embraced, and how St. Peter rebuked him for thinking that the gift of God might be purchased with money, Acts viii. 20; but I would observe that some of those persons who insist upon the fact that Simon was not a Christian appear to have forgotten that he was actually baptized. For a time, at least, he believed in Jesus Christ; and part of this belief he appears always to have retained; that is, he always believed that Jesus Christ was a being more than human, who came from God. If these events happened, as I have supposed, within a short time of our Lord's ascension, the fathers had good reason to call Simon Magus the parent of all heresies; for he must then have been among the first persons, beyond the limits of Jerusalem, who embraced the gospel; and we might hope that there was no one before him who perverted the faith which he had professed.

From the detailed account which we have of Simon in the Acts of the Apostles, I should be inclined to infer these two things: 1. That St. Luke knew no earlier instance of apostasy from the gospel; and he mentions this because it was the first; and, 2. That when St. Luke wrote the Acts of the Apostles, the heresy of Simon was widely spread; and therefore he tells his readers how it had begun. Concerning the remainder of Simon's life we know little, and in that little it is difficult to separate truth from fiction. I should be inclined, for the reasons given above, to believe the account of Justin Martyr, who says that Simon Magus went to Rome in the reign of Claudius, and attracted numerous followers. Eusebius quotes this passage of Justin Martyr; but he adds, upon some other authority, which he does not name, that St. Peter came to Rome at the same time; and that, in consequence of his preaching, the popularity of the impostor was entirely destroyed. This would be a most interesting and important fact, if we were certain of its being true; but Eusebius contradicts himself in his account of Simon Magus going to Rome; and later writers have so embellished the story of this meeting, and made the death of Simon so astonishingly miraculous, that criticism is at a loss to know what to believe. The account which we have of Simon's death is, in a few words, as follows: St. Peter and St. Paul being both at Rome, Simon Magus gave out that he was Christ; and, in proof of his assertion, he undertook to raise himself aloft into the air. The attempt at first appeared as if it would succeed; but the two apostles addressing themselves in prayer to God, the impostor fell to the ground, and his death ensued shortly after. It is difficult to give this marvellous narration without forgetting that we are treating of a grave and sacred subject; and the question for us to consider is, whether we are to look upon the whole as a fiction, or whether, as is most probable, it contains a basis and groundwork of truth. I must observe, in the first place, that Arnobius, who did not write till the fourth century, is the first person who says any thing of Simon's death at all approaching to this story; nor does he by any means give it all the particulars which later writers have supplied. It will be observed, also, that Eusebius, who wrote after Arnobius, does not say any thing of Simon's extraordinary end; but merely states that his credit and influence were extinguished, as soon as St. Peter began to preach in Rome. It is probable, therefore, that no Greek writer before the time of Eusebius had mentioned this story; but, on the other hand, there is such a host of evidence that the death of Simon Magus was in some way or other connected with the presence of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome, that we might be carrying our skepticism too far if we rejected it.

With respect to the doctrines of Simon Magus, we know for certain that Christ held a conspicuous place in the philosophy which he taught; but to define with accuracy the various points of this philosophy, is a difficult if not impossible task. The fathers, perhaps, may be suspected of laying too many impieties to the charge of this heretic; and some of their accounts cannot be reconciled with each other. Still, however, we may extract from their writings an outline of the truth; and in this instance, as before, I would attach particular weight to the authority of Justin Martyr. That writer says that nearly all the inhabitants of Samaria, and a few persons in other countries, acknowledged and worshipped Simon Magus as the first or supreme God; and in another place he says that they styled him God, above all dominion, and authority, and power. Later writers have increased the blasphemy of this doctrine, and said that Simon declared himself to the Samaritans as the Father, to the Jews as the Son, and to the rest of the world as the Holy Ghost. But I cannot bring myself to believe that he ever advanced so far in wickedness or absurdity. The true state of the case may perhaps be collected from the words of St. Luke, who tells us that Simon gave himself out to be "some great one," and that the people said of him, "This man is the great power of God." Acts viii. 10. Such is the title which he bore before he had heard of Christ; and there is no reason to think that he afterward raised his pretensions, and identified himself with God. He gave himself out as "the great power of God," that is, a person in whom Divine power resided; and, after he had heard the apostles, he seems to have so far enlarged his doctrine as to have said that the God whose minister he was, and who had always been worshipped in Samaria, had revealed himself to the Jews by his Son, and to the rest of the world by the Holy Ghost. There is reason to believe that he declared himself to be the Christ who appeared to the Jews; or rather, he said that the same spirit which descended upon Jesus had descended afterward upon himself; for he did not believe that Jesus had a real body, but he taught that he was only a phantom. To this he added, that the Holy Ghost, by which God was revealed to the Gentiles, resided in himself; and this I take to be the real origin of the story that he was the God who revealed himself as the Father to the Samaritans, as the Son to the Jews, and as the Holy Ghost to the rest of the world.

Another charge, which is equally difficult to believe, relates to a female companion, whom he is said to have declared to be the first idea, or conception, which he, as God, put forth from his mind. By another mental process, in which this first idea was a partner, he produced the angels, and they created the world. All this was highly mystical, and writers have had recourse to different allegories, by which the absurdity may be explained. That Simon never identified a real living person with an idea emanating from the mind of God, may, I think, be assumed as certain. But we see, in this story, evident traces of the Gnostic doctrines. Valentinus, in the second century, made the first cause, or Bythus, act upon Σύνη, or Ἐννοια, that is, upon his own mind, and produce the first pair of æons. This then was the doctrine of Simon: the supreme God, by a mental process, produced different orders of angels, and they created the world. It was this same God whose first or principal power resided in Simon Magus. But when later writers had said that he actually proclaimed himself as God, it followed that it was he who, by an operation of his own mind, produced the angels. If I have argued rightly, I have freed the doctrine of Simon Magus from some of its impieties; but there is still much which is absurd, and much which is impious; for he believed that the world was created, not by the supreme God, but by inferior beings: he taught, also, that Christ was one of those successive generations of æons which were derived from God; not the æon which created the world; but he was sent from God to rescue mankind from the tyranny of the demiurgus, or creative æon. Simon was also inventor of the strange notion, that the Jesus who was said to be born and crucified had not a material body, but was only a phantom. His other doctrines were, that the writers of the Old Testament were not inspired by the supreme God, the Fountain of good, but by those inferior beings who created the world, and who were the authors of evil. He denied a general resurrection; and the lives of himself and his followers are said to have been a continued course of impure and vicious conduct.

Such was the doctrine and the practice of Simon Magus, from whom all the pseudo-Christian or Gnostic heresies were said to be derived. Simon himself seems to have been one of those Jews who, as we learn from the Acts of the Apostles, travelled about the country exorcising evil spirits. But he was also a man of speculative mind; and, having studied the doctrines of Plato, he entered into the questions which were then so commonly agitated, concerning the eternity of matter, and the origin of evil. Hence we find him embracing the opinion that the world was created by angels, who were themselves produced from God. This was a corrupted Platonism. Plato imagined that the ideas which were in the mind of the Deity created intellectual beings: Simon taught that the Supreme God, by an operation of his own mind, produced the angels. The first intelligences of Plato were employed by God to create the world: Simon also taught that the angels, or æons, created the world; but in one respect the Gnostics had totally changed the philosophy of Plato; for they taught that the angel, or angels, who created the world, acted contrary to the wishes of the Supreme God.

[SIMONY. A word, derived from Simon, (Acts viii. 18-23,) which became current in the days of Gregory I., to designate the using of bribes, or any other unfair means to obtain ordination. It is denounced in the Apostolical Constitutions, and, as appears from Theodoret, was stigmatized in the fifth century by the term Χριστεμπορία, trafficking with Christ. The Council of Chalcedon, and other councils, as well as the laws of Justinian, decreed that the bishop who conferred orders by simony, and the party thus ordained, should both be deposed. The candidate for ordination was required to swear that no unfair means had been employed in his election, and the electors were required to take an oath that they chose him solely for the soundness of his faith, life, and learning.]

[SIMPLICITY. פִּשְׁטוּת, silliness, Prov. i. 22: compare Prov. viii. 5; xiv. 15. רָחֹם, integrity, 2 Sam. xv. 11: compare Gen. xx. 5. 'Απλότης, singleness of mind, ingenuousness, Rom. xii. 8: 2 Cor. i. 12; xi. 3: Eph. vi. 5: Col. iii. 22. 'Ακακός, Rom. xvi. 18, corresponds to נָכוֹן, Job viii. 20, and means free from evil, artless: compare Heb. vii. 26, where it is rendered harmless. 'Ακέραιος, Matt. x. 16: Rom. xvi. 19: Phil. ii. 15, means unmixed; that is, free from deceit, sincere—rendered interchangeably simple and harmless in the text and margin, and simplices in the Vulgate.]

SIN, the transgression of the law, or want of conformity to the will of God. 1 John iii. 4. Original sin is that whereby our whole nature is corrupted, and rendered contrary to the nature and law of God; or, according to the ninth article of the Church of England, "It is that whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is, of his own nature, inclined to evil." This is sometimes called "indwelling sin." Rom. vii. The imputation of the sin of Adam to his posterity is also what divines call, with some latitude of expression, original sin. Actual sin is a direct violation of God's law, and generally applied to those who are capable of committing moral evil, as opposed to idiots or children, who have not the right use of their powers. Sins of omission consist in leaving those things undone which ought to be done. Sins of commission are those which are committed against affirmative precepts, or doing what should not be done. Sins of infirmity are those which arise from ignorance, surprise, etc. Secret sins are those committed in secret, or those of which, through blindness or prejudice, we do not see the evil. Psalm xix. 7-12. Presumptuous sins are those which are done boldly against light and conviction. The unpardonable sin is, according to some, the ascribing to the devil the miracles which Christ wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost. This sin, or blasphemy, as it should rather be called, many scribes and Pharisees were guilty of, who, beholding our Lord do his miracles, affirmed that he wrought them by Beelzebub, the prince of devils, which was, in effect, calling the Holy Ghost Satan, a most horrible blasphemy; and as on this ground they rejected Christ, and salvation by him, their sin could certainly have no forgiveness, Mark iii. 22-30. No one therefore could be guilty of this blasphemy, except those who were spectators of Christ's miracles. There is, however, another view of this unpardonable offence, which deserves consideration: The sin or blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, says Bishop Tomline, is mentioned in the first three Gospels. It appears that all the three evangelists agree in representing the sin or blasphemy against the Holy Ghost as a crime which would not be forgiven; but no one of them affirms that those who had ascribed Christ's power of casting out devils to Beelzebub had been guilty of that sin; and in St. Luke it is not mentioned that any such charge had been made. Our Saviour, according to the account in St. Matthew and St. Mark, endeavored to convince the Jews of their error; but so far from accusing them of having committed an unpardonable sin in what they had said concerning him, he declares that "whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him;" that is, whatever reproaches men may utter against the Son of man during his ministry, however they may calumniate the authority upon which he acts, it is still possible that hereafter they may repent and believe, and all their sins may be forgiven them; but the reviling of the Holy Ghost is described as an offence of a far more heinous nature: "The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men." "He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness." "Unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost it shall not be forgiven." It is plain that this sin against the Holy Ghost could not be committed while our Saviour was upon earth, since he always speaks of the Holy Ghost as not being to come till after his ascension into heaven. A few days after that great event, the descent of the Holy Ghost enabled the apostles to work miracles, and communicated to them a variety of other supernatural gifts. If men should ascribe these powers to Beelzebub, or in any respect reject their authority, they would blaspheme the Holy Ghost from whom they were derived; and that sin would be unpardonable, because this was the completion of the evidence of the Divine authority of Christ and his religion; and they who rejected these last means of conviction, could have no other opportunity of being brought to faith in Christ, the only appointed condition of pardon and forgiveness. The greater heinousness of the sin of these men would consist in their rejecting a greater body of testimony; for they are supposed to be acquainted with the resurrection of our Saviour from the dead, with his ascension into heaven, with the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost, and with the supernatural powers which it communicated; circumstances all of which were enforced by the apostles when they preached the gospel, but none of which could be known to those who refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah during his actual ministry. Though this was a great sin, it was not an unpardonable one; it might be remedied by subsequent belief—by yielding to subsequent testimony. But, on the other hand, they who finally rejected the accumulated and complete evidence of Jesus being the Messiah, as exhibited by the inspired apostles, precluded themselves from the possibility of conviction, because no further testimony would be afforded them; and consequently, there being no means of repentance, they would be incapable of forgiveness and redemption. Hence it appears that the sin against the Holy Ghost consisted in finally rejecting the gospel as preached by the apostles, who confirmed the truth of the doctrine which they taught "by signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost." Heb. ii. 4. It was unpardonable, because this was the consummation of the proofs afforded to the men of that generation of the Divine mission of Christ. This sin was manifestly distinct from all other sins; it indicated an invincible obstinacy of mind, an impious and unalterable determination to refuse the offered mercy of God. It would appear from this, that those only committed or could commit this irremissible offence who were witnesses of the mighty works wrought by the Holy Spirit in the apostles after Christ's ascension and the day of pentecost. Our Lord's declaration appears chiefly to respect the Jews. This view will serve to explain those passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews in which the hopeless case of Jewish apostates is described. But see BLASPHEMY.

SIN. To the Desert of Sin, their tenth station, the Israelites came in exactly a month after they left Egypt; and here again they murmured for "the bread and the flesh-pots of Egypt." So the Lord gave them quails for a day, and manna for forty years, till they came to the borders of Canaan. On this occasion the institution of the Sabbath was revived as a day of rest, which had been intermitted during their Egyptian bondage. On this day there fell no manna; but on the preceding they were directed to gather two days' provision. To perpetuate the memorial of "this bread from heaven" to future generations, a pot of manna, which was preserved fresh by a standing miracle, was ordered to be laid up beside the ark of the covenant, in the sanctuary. Exodus xvi.

[SIN. סין. Ezek. xxx. 15, 16. The LXX. render it Σαῖν and Σινύη; Bochart and Michaelis also favor Syene. It is, however, generally considered Pelusium, and is so rendered in the Vulgate. Its modern name, Tineh, like Sin, means clay; and Pelusium comes from πηλός, mud. Its ruins are among the swamps on the most easterly mouth of the Nile, and consist of mounds and a few broken columns, which are only accessible by boats, or by wading through the mud.]

SINAI, a famous mountain of Arabia Petræa, on which God gave the law to Moses. Exod. xix. 1; xxiv. 16; xxxi. 18; xxxiv. 2, 4, etc.: Lev. xxv. 1; xxvi. 46. It stands in a kind of peninsula formed by the two arms of the Red Sea, one extending north, called the Gulf of Kolsom, the other extending east, called the Gulf of Elan. The Arabs call Mount Sinai by the name of Tor, that is, the mountain, by way of excellence; or Gibel Mousa, "the mountain of Moses." It is two hundred and sixty miles from Cairo, which is a journey of ten days. The wilderness of Sinai, where the Israelites continued encamped almost a year, and where Moses erected the tabernacle of the covenant, is considerably elevated above the rest of the country; the ascent to it is very craggy, the greater part cut out of the rock; then one comes to a large space of ground, which is a plain surrounded on all sides by rocks and eminences, whose length is nearly twelve miles. Toward the extremity of this plain, on the north, two high mountains appear; the highest is called Sinai, the other Horeb. They are of very steep ascent, and do not stand on much ground in comparison to their extraordinary height. Sinai is at least one third part higher than the other, and its ascent more upright and difficult. The top of the mountain terminates in an uneven and rugged space, which might contain about sixty persons. On this eminence is built a little chapel, called St. Catherine's, where it is thought the body of this saint rested for three hundred and sixty years; but afterward it was removed into a church at the foot of the mountain. Near this chapel issues a fountain of very good fresh water; it is looked upon as miraculous, it not being conceivable how water can flow from the brow of so high and so barren a mountain. Mount Horeb stands west of Sinai, so that at sun-rising the shadow of Sinai covers Horeb. Besides the little fountain at the top of Sinai, there is another at the foot of Horeb, which supplies the monastery of St. Catherine. Five or six paces from thence they show a stone, whose height is four or five feet, and breadth about three, which they say is the very stone from whence Moses caused the water to gush out. Its color is of a spotted gray, and it is, as it were, set in a kind of earth where no other rock appears. This stone has twelve holes or channels, which are about a foot wide, from whence they say the water issued which the Israelites drank.

"Sinai," says Sandys, "has three tops of a marvellous height: that on the west side, where God appeared to Moses in a bush, fruitful in pasture, far lower than the middlemost, and shadowed when the sun riseth thereon; which is that whereon God gave the law to Moses, and which is now called the Mount of Moses, at the foot of which stands the monastery called St. Catherine's, from which there were steps formerly up to the very top of the mountain, and were computed fourteen thousand in number. At present some of them are broken, but those that remain are well made, and easy to go up and down. There are, in several places of the ascent, good cisterns, and especially near the top a fair and good one. The third or most easterly summit is called by the religious in those parts, Mount Catherine, on the top of which there is a dome, under which they say was interred the body of this saint, brought thither by angels after she was beheaded at Alexandria." One may judge of the height of St. Catherine's Mount—which certainly is not so high as that of Moses by a third part—from this circumstance, that Thevenot found much snow on both when he was there, which was in February. The monastery of St. Catherine is from Cairo some eight days' journey over the deserts.

[The scriptural Sinai does not appear to be a mountain distinct from Horeb, but rather a particular summit of the Horeb range, which is some forty miles in diameter. See HOREB. The monks, however, apply the name Sinai in a general way to the whole cluster, but in a stricter sense only to the ridge lying between the two parallel valleys Shu'eib and el-Leja, or rather the southern end of it—Jebel Mûsa, the Mount of Moses; the northern end they call Horeb. Robinson and Olin give good reasons why the monkish summit cannot be considered the mountain on which the law was given, and reasons equally good in favor of what is called Horeb, a name which does not appear to be known to the Arabs, who call it Râs-es-Sufsâfeh. Dr. Olin, after describing its difficult ascent, says, "The summit of Sooksafa," as he writes it, "which, seen from Wady el Raha, seems but a point, spread out into a level area of considerable extent, composed of dark-gray, sun-burnt granite. The view from this point is little inferior to that from Sinai, and embraces nearly the same region. I was most gratified to ascertain that it perfectly commands the plain of El Raha, and that every object of sufficient magnitude, and every transaction upon its summit, must have been seen by the encamped Israelites. My opinion, that it is the real Sinai, was, of course, strongly confirmed. There are two other summits upon this end of the mountain rather more lofty than this, within the distance of half a mile or a little more. I ascended them without much difficulty, to ascertain if either had any claim to the honor which I had awarded already to the first. I was soon satisfied that they have not." He then adduces the scriptural passages which corroborate his opinion: Exod. xix., xx., xxiv., xxxiii. Dr. Robinson says, "The almost inaccessible peak of es-Sufsâfeh rises some five hundred feet above the basin; and the distance to the summit is more than half a mile. The extreme difficulty and even danger of the ascent was well rewarded by the prospect that now opened before us. The whole plain er-Râhah lay spread out beneath our feet, with the adjacent wadys and mountains; while Wady esh-Sheikh on the right, and the recess on the left, both connected with and opening broadly from er-Râhah, presented an area which serves nearly to double that of the plain. Our conviction was strengthened that here or on some one of the adjacent cliffs was the spot where the Lord 'descended in fire' and proclaimed the law. Here lay the plain where the whole congregation might be assembled; here was the the mount that could be approached and touched, if not forbidden; and here the mountain brow, where alone the lightnings and the thick cloud would be visible, and the thunders and the voice of the trumpet be heard, when the Lord 'came down in the sight of all the people upon Mount Sinai.'" Robinson measured the plain along the water-shed, and found the breadth twenty-seven hundred English feet; the distance to the base of Horeb seven thousand feet—an area of a square mile, which is nearly doubled by the recess on the west and the level area of Wady esh-Sheikh on the east, issuing at right angles from the plain, and equally in view of the front and summit of the present Horeb, or Sufsâfeh. This would be space sufficient for the congregation convened to receive the law. The height of Jebel Mûsa is seven thousand and thirty-five Paris feet—from it the peak of St. Catherine, which is one thousand feet higher, bears south 44° west, and Sufsâfeh north 22° west. Sinai, in view of its thrilling and sublime associations, is frequently alluded to in the Bible: e. g., Deut. xxxiii. 2; Judges v. 5; 1 Kings xix. 8; Ps. lxxviii. 8, 17; Hab. iii. 3; Acts vii. 30; Gal. iv. 24, 25; Heb. xii. 18.]

[SINAITIC INSCRIPTIONS. Inscriptions on the rocks of Wady and Jebel Mokatteb, or the Written Valley and Mountain, and other valleys and mountains of the Peninsula of Sinai. They were first mentioned by Cosmas, about A. D. 535, who supposed them to be the work of the Israelites, when encamped in the wilderness. The Rev. C. Forster, in his volume on "The One Primeval Language," endorses this view. He thinks he has succeeded in deciphering many of those inscriptions: one of his translations refers to the transactions at Marah: "The people with prone mouth drinketh at the water-springs. Smiting with the branch of a tree, the well of bitterness he heals." Dr. Beer, of Leipzig, a distinguished palæographer, who also thinks he has deciphered them, considers them the work of the Nabathæans. He has discovered no Jewish or Christian name among them, and does not date them higher than the fourth century of our era. Dr. Tuch throws back the date several centuries. As the cross is found frequently in these inscriptions, they have been attributed to Christian pilgrims, perhaps of the fourth century. Gesenius thinks the characters belong to a species of Aramæan, used in the first centuries of the Christian era, in Syria and Egypt, having affinity with those of the Palmyrene monuments. Many of those inscriptions, consisting of letters and representations of men, camels, goats, asses, horses, and other animals, have been copied and published by Burckhardt, by Mr. Grey, in the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature," and by other authors; and descriptions of them may be found in Robinson's "Researches," sec. iii., and Stanley's "Sinai and Palestine."]

[SINCERITY. Εὐκρίνεια, 1 Cor. v. 8: 2 Cor. i. 12; ii. 17, denotes such purity as will bear the closest examination, like that of an article inspected in the light of the sun. Compare Phil. i. 10: 2 Pet. iii. 1. Sincere, ἁδολος, 1 Pet. ii. 2, means pure, unadulterated, as in Æschylus, Ag. 94.]

[SINIM: Isa. xlix. 12. The context seems to locate this at a great distance from Judea. The Vulgate puts it in the south, which is favored by Michaelis and others, who say Syene, and also by those who say Sin, or Pelusium. As Sinim is the plural of Sin, and means bushes, some think it refers to Africa at large, which is a bushy region. By the "far" country they understand the east—as Babylon, etc., so that the four points are embraced in the passage. The LXX, however understand by Sinim, Persia. It is now generally thought to be China, which was not unknown to the ancients; and many Jews are dispersed through that empire.]

SION, or ZION, MOUNT, a mount or hill on the south of Old Jerusalem or Salem, and higher than that on which the ancient city stood. This hill was, perhaps on this account, made choice of by the Jebusites for building a fort or citadel upon; which fort was taken by David, who transferred his court thither from Hebron, and brought the ark of the Lord and set it in a tabernacle or tent pitched for it. On this account it is that this hill is so frequently styled in the Psalms the "holy hill;" and, by way of excellence, is used in the poetical language of Scripture to denote the whole city of Jerusalem. Here David built a palace, and a city, called after him the City of David; and which subsequently formed a part of Jerusalem, enclosed within the same walls, although a great part of the hill is now left without them; while, on the contrary, Calvary, which is supposed to have stood formerly without the walls, is now enclosed within them, the city having drawn itself round about this sacred mount. "This hill," says M. Chateaubriand, "is of a yellowish color, and barren appearance; open in form of a crescent, toward Jerusalem; and is about as high as Montmartre at Paris, but rounder at the top. This sacred summit is distinguished by three monuments, or, more properly, by three ruins—the house of Caiaphas, the place where Christ celebrated his last supper, and the tomb or palace of David. From the top of the hill you see, to the south, the Valley of Ben Hinnom; beyond this, the Field of Blood, purchased with the thirty pieces of silver given to Judas; the Hill of Evil Counsel, the tombs of the Judges, and the whole desert toward Hebron and Bethlehem. To the north, the wall of Jerusalem, which passes over the top of Zion, intercepts the view of the city, the site of which gradually slopes toward the Valley of Jehoshaphat."

Dr. Richardson observes of Zion, "At the time when I visited this sacred ground, one part of it supported a crop of barley, another was undergoing the labor of the plough, and the soil turned up consisted of stones and lime mixed with earth, such as is usually met with in the foundations of ruined cities. It is nearly a mile in circumference, is highest on the west side, and toward the east falls down in broad terraces on the upper part of the mountain, and narrow ones on the side as it slopes down toward the brook Kidron. Each terrace is divided from the one above it by a low wall of dry stone, built of the ruins of this celebrated spot. The terraces near the bottom of the hill are used as gardens, and are watered from the pool of Siloam. We have here another remarkable instance of the special fulfilment of prophecy. 'Therefore shall Zion for your sakes be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps.' Micah iii. 12." Mr. Jolliffe represents the hill of Zion as not more raised above the city than the Aventine hill above the Roman forum; but conjectures that its height, from its base in the Valley of Gehinnom, from which it rises abruptly, may be equivalent to some of the lowest hills which encompass Bath; that is, if the estimate be correct, about three hundred and sixty feet, which is the height of the lowest of the hills above that city.

[Dr. Robinson says, "The height of Zion above the valley at the south-west corner of the wall is one hundred and four feet, and that of the ground at the Yafa gate forty-four; but these differences arise as much from the rapid sinking of the valley as from the increased height of Zion toward the south." He estimates the elevation of the southern brow above the well of Nehemiah at three hundred feet; Schubert fixes it at two hundred and forty-one Paris feet above the Valley of Jehoshaphat, probably opposite the great mosque. The stronghold of Zion, says Stanley, "was emphatically the lair of the lion of Judah, of 'Ariel,' the Lion of God." Ps. lxxvi.: Isa. xxix. 1-8. The palaces of Solomon and Herod were located on Zion. And as this was the site of the tabernacle and was contiguous to Moriah, the site of the temple, it is used as a symbol of the Church, Jewish, Christian, and celestial. 2 Sam. vii.: Ps. lxx. 1; lxxxiv. 7; cxxxii.: Isa. ii. 3: Heb. xii. 22: Rev. xiv. 1. See JERUSALEM.]

[SION. A name of Hermon. Deut. iv. 48. Instead of צִיּוֹן, the Syriac reads שִׁרְיוֹן, Sirion, according to Deut. iii. 9. Some think this is the Zion spoken of Psalm cxxxiii. 3, in connection with Hermon, and the rather, as the plural, "mountains," does not appear to be applicable to the hill at Jerusalem. But the name is צִיּוֹן. The mountains of Zion may mean Zion and the adjacent hills, which are refreshed with dews, though not perhaps as copious as those of Hermon. For other conjectures, see Boothroyd on Ps. cxxxiii.]

[SIRION. The Sidonian name of Hermon. Deut. iii. 9.: Ps. xxix. 6.]

[SISERA. Captain of Jabin's army. Judg. iv., v.]

SISTER, in the style of the Hebrews, has equal latitude as brother. It is used not only for a sister by natural relation from the same father and mother, but also for a sister only by the same father or by the same mother, or a near relation only. Sarah is called sister to Abraham, Gen. xii. 13; xx. 12, though only his niece according to some, or sister by the father's side according to others. In the law, Lev. xviii. 18, it is forbidden to take to wife the sister of a wife; to marry two sisters; or, according to some interpreters, to marry a second wife, having one already. Literally, "Thou shalt not take a wife over her sister to afflict her;" as if meaning to forbid polygamy. In the Gospels, the brothers and sisters of Jesus Christ are his cousins, children of the sisters of the holy virgin. Matt. xiii. 56: Mark vi. 3.

[SIVAN. See MONTHS.]

[SIX ARTICLES, ACT OF THE. An Act of Parliament passed A. D. 1539, designed to establish transubstantiation, communion in one kind, clerical celibacy, vows of chastity, private masses, auricular confession. The penalty for the breach of the first was burning as a heretic; of any of the rest, hanging as a felon. It was well called, The Bloody Statute: it helped to give Smithfield its "everlasting fame." Cranmer, who narrowly escaped from its severity, secured its mitigation in 1540 and 1544; it was revoked in 1547.]

SLAVE. See SERVANT.

SLEEP, SLEEPING, SLUMBERING, is taken either for the sleep or repose of the body; or for the sleep of the soul, which is supineness, indolence, stupidity; or for the sleep of death: "You shall sleep with your fathers;" you shall die, as they are dead. Jeremiah (li. 39) threatens Babylon, in the name of the Lord, with a perpetual sleep, out of which they shall not awake. Daniel (xii. 2) speaks of those that sleep in the dust of the grave. "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go that I may awake him," John xi. 11: he is dead, let us go and raise him up. "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." Eph. v. 14. Here St. Paul speaks to those that were dead in sin and infidelity. St. Peter says of the wicked, "Their damnation slumbereth not." 2 Peter ii. 3. God is not asleep: he will not forget to punish them in his own due time. Isaiah (lxv. 4) speaks of a superstitious practice among the Pagans, who went to sleep in the temples of their idols, to obtain prophetic dreams: "They remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments." The word which we translate "monuments," signifies places "kept" or "observed." Some interpret it of idol temples; some of caves and dens, in which the heathens used to worship their idols; and some of tombs or monuments for dead persons. Thus also the superstitious and idolatrous Jews, in contempt of the prophets, and of the temple of the Lord, went into the tombs and temples of idols to sleep there, and to have dreams that might discover future events to them. The pagans for this purpose used to lie upon the skins of the sacrificed victims.

[SLIME. See PITCH.]

SLINGS. See ARMS.

[SMALCALD, LEAGUE OF. A Protestant alliance formed at Smalcald, Germany, in 1530, occasioned by the edict of Augsburg. In 1535, Francis I. of France entered into a negotiation with the members of the League, which, in 1536, was renewed for ten years. In 1537, an assembly of Protestants met at Smalcald, and adopted "Articles," drawn up by Luther, designed to show how far the Protestants were willing to go to prevent a final rupture with Rome. The King of Denmark and other princes afterward joined the League.]

[SMITH. חרש. Charash means a mechanic: it is applied particularly to a worker in metals, 1 Sam. xiii. 19: Isa. xlv. 12; liv. 16. Tubal-cain appears to have been the first smith. Gen. iv. 22. Demetrius, the silversmith, was, as ἀργυροκόπος means, a worker in silver—either one who made models of the shrine of Diana, or medals bearing its representation. A coppersmith named Alexander is mentioned, 2 Tim. iv. 14.]

SMYRNA, a city of Asia Minor, and one of the finest in all the Levant. It contended for the honor of giving birth to Homer, and its title is by many thought to be the best founded. The Christian Church in Smyrna was one of the seven churches of Asia, to which the Apostle John was commanded to address an epistle. Rev. ii. 8-10. The present Smyrna, which the Turks call Esmir, is about four miles in circumference, and contains a population of about a hundred thousand souls. It is less remarkable for the elegance of its buildings than for the beauty of its situation, the extent of its commerce, and the riches of its inhabitants.

[It is situated in a plain at the head of the Gulf of Smyrna, lat. 38° 26', N.; long. 27° 9', E. In 1402 it was ruined by Timour, and has since repeatedly suffered from earthquakes and plagues. It was greatly injured by a fire in 1845. It has been rebuilt, but the houses are generally of wood, and the streets narrow and filthy. Its present population is estimated at one hundred and fifty thousand, of whom eighty thousand are Turks, who occupy the upper part of the city: they have twenty mosques: along the shore live forty thousand Greeks, who have five churches, and five thousand Franks, who have four churches, two Romish and two Protestant. Higher up reside ten thousand Armenians, who have two churches, and a large academy: fifteen thousand Jews are packed together in two quarters between the Turks and Armenians; they have several synagogues. Numerous coffee-houses are scattered along the Meles, which flows into the gulf east of the city; and there are extensive cemeteries on the declivity of Mount Pagus, on which are remains of the apocalyptic city. The exports of Smyrna consist of silk, cotton, copper, carpets, hides, figs, drugs, etc. Its trade is chiefly with Britain, Austria, France, and the United States.]

[SNAIL. חַמֵּשׁ, rendered snail, Lev. xi. 30, is rendered liard in the LXX. and Vulgate: so Bochart. שְׂבִילִי, Ps. lviii. 9, (8, Eng.), is derived by Bochart from שְׂבִיל, a path, the snail marking his path with his slime; or from ב, in, and לִי, a winding shell. Parkhurst derives it from שָׂבַל, to thrust forward, alluding to the mode in which the snail moves along. Others render the word flood, which rapidly passes away. Compare Ps. lxxix. 2, 15; (3, 16, Heb.) xc. 5.]

[SNOW. The custom of putting snow into beverages to cool them, which is still common in the east, seems to be alluded to, Prov. xxv. 13; and the peculiarly detergent character of snow-water, Job ix. 30. It is spoken of as a symbol of purity, Ps. li. 7: Isa. i. 18: Lam. iv. 7.]

[SO. An Egyptian king, supposed to be Sabacus. 2 Kings xvii. 4.]

[SOAP. Borith means a purifier, Jer. ii. 22: Mal. iii. 2. Some refer it to a mineral, and others to a vegetable substance used in washing.]

SOCINIANS, a sect so called from Faustus Socinus, who died in Poland in 1604. This celebrated man was born in Tuscany, and was descended from an ancient and noble family. In the earlier period of his life he devoted little time to literary acquisitions, but he was possessed of a vigorous understanding, and of that steady fortitude which qualified him for the memorable part which he afterward acted. His connection with his uncle Lælius probably gave a bias to his mind with respect to religion. He warmly embraced his tenets, and he spent a great part of his days in studying and disseminating them. Having left his native country, he visited Poland, and finally he settled in it for the express purpose of propagating his own peculiar views of religious truth. The fundamental principles which he assumed were, the rejection of all mystery from revelation, and the necessity of trying its doctrines by the light of reason; and he rigorously applied this latter maxim in conducting his theological investigations. He inculcated in the strictest sense the unity of God; considered the Word and the Holy Ghost as attributes of the Supreme Being; taught that Christ was a man peculiarly honored by the Almighty, having been born through the operation of the Spirit; and that he was so highly exalted in consequence of his office as the Saviour of the world, that he might be styled the Son of God, and ought to be worshipped. Struck with several declarations of our Lord which seemed to imply that he had descended from heaven, and which militated against his leading tenet respecting Jesus, he endeavored to evade the application of them, by supposing or affirming that, previous to the commencement of our Saviour's ministry, he had, through the power of God, been taken up to the celestial regions, and had in them received from the Almighty the truths which he was commissioned to reveal.

The first reception of Socinus in Poland, even by those who might have been expected to welcome him, was most discouraging. The Unitarian churches which had been previously established in that kingdom, differing from him in several points, would not admit him into their communion; and he had to encounter the enmity of the great majority of Christians, who abhorred his tenets, and branded them as impious. But, notwithstanding all this, and although he was visited with much suffering and affliction, his perseverance, his talents, and his zeal soon excited admiration; his views were adopted by many even in the highest stations of life; his principles were embodied in a catechism, which, though not imposed upon his followers, they read with very extensive acquiescence; and he had the satisfaction of beholding the sentiments which he had long cherished, embraced by various churches enjoying the protection of government and permitted to establish seminaries of education by which the impression made on the public mind might be preserved and deepened. There was not, however, perfect unanimity of faith among all his associates who united in denying the divinity of our Lord. Vast numbers of these, previous to their having perused the papers of Lælius Socinus, had so far received the system of Arianism, that they believed Christ to have existed before he entered into the world; and although many, in consequence of the reasonings and representations of Socinus, abandoned this doctrine, it was retained by some, who, from their leader, were called Farnovians. Socinus conducted himself toward these men with admirable address. Fully aware that the tendency of their having departed so far from the orthodox tenets was to lead them to still further recession, and sensible that his own system naturally and consequentially resulted from what they readily admitted, he used every method to conciliate them; and he permitted them to remain with his followers upon condition of their not openly insisting on the pre-existence of Christ. They did, however, at length separate from the great body of his adherents; but they gradually approached nearer and nearer to them, and, upon the death of Farnovius, most of them incorporated themselves with the Socinians, and all trace of them as a distinct party was obliterated.

Socinus was much more agitated by the promulgation of an opinion very opposite to those now mentioned. As might have been anticipated, there were some who, having adopted the sentiments of Lælius Socinus as to the simple humanity of Christ, deduced from this tenet consequences which appeared to them obviously to flow from it, although these had not been perceived or admitted by Lælius himself. A striking example of this took place in the time of Faustus Socinus. Francis David, a man of considerable influence among the Unitarians, being the superintendent of their churches in Transylvania, maintained that, as Christ was born just like other men, so he continued, notwithstanding his exaltation, to be merely a human being; and that, therefore, all invocation of him, and worship paid to him, were to be shunned as impiety or idolatry. Socinus inveighed with the utmost warmth against this opinion; he used every method to induce David to renounce it; and, at the desire of one of his friends, he resided for a considerable time at the house of his opponent, that the subject at issue might be fully and calmly discussed. He failed, however, in accomplishing his object. David persisted—as he had, upon the ground which he had taken, good reason to do—in asserting the doctrine which he had announced; and he was soon after thus thrown by the Prince of Transylvania into prison, where he lingered for several years, and then died at an advanced age. It has been insinuated that Socinus was accessory to this cruel deed of detestable persecution; and, although attempts have been made to wipe off the imputation, there is too much cause to think that it is not wholly unfounded. Most certain it is that he had it much at heart to root out what he viewed as the heresy of David, and that the support of it after the death of the unhappy sufferer by some distinguished Unitarians gave him much uneasiness. It is not unlikely that the zeal which he thus displayed arose from his apprehension that the tenets which he opposed would supplant his own, and from the difficulty that he must have experienced in turning aside the inferences which were affirmed to follow from what he admitted. If such was the case—and it seems in many respects more probable than the conjecture of Mosheim, that it is to be attributed to the dread of rendering the sect more odious than it actually was—we have a striking proof of his discernment, though at the expense of his candor; for the present creed of Unitarianism approaches much nearer to that of David than to the doctrines of the founder of Socinianism himself.

But, while he was thus disquieted by opposition which, after the liberty with which he had himself departed from the faith of the most ancient and numerous Christian Churches, should have created no surprise, he was highly gratified by the zeal and the establishment of his followers. Under the protection of the ample toleration which they enjoyed in Poland, they were sedulous in their attempts to imprint their tenets upon those among whom they lived, and to send these tenets abroad to foreign nations. The Anti-trinitarians in Poland had early translated the Scriptures, and their successors under Socinus composed many works with the design of defending the principles of their faith. They also sent missionaries to propagate their views and to disseminate the books which supported them, anticipating success similar to that which had accompanied their efforts in Transylvania. But in Hungary and in Austria they were successfully opposed by the united and cordial efforts of Catholics and Protestants. In Holland they were more fortunate; and in England they established only one congregation, which differed in some points from the parent sect, and which soon dwindled away.

These failures, which the ardor, the ability, and the high rank of many who engaged in the diffusion of Socinianism were unable to prevent, were soon followed by their expulsion from the country in which they had so long remained in security and peace. Toward the middle of the seventeenth century, some of the students attending the academy at Racow, wantonly insulted the feelings and the principles of the Catholics, by a contemptible act of outrage against a crucifix, which, with stones, they threw down from the place in which it had been erected. By men warmly attached to their own religion, and who had at all times regarded the Socinians as undermining its foundation, this youthful excess was represented as confirming all the charges that had been made against the community to which the perpetrators belonged, and they determined to exert themselves to procure their punishment or extirpation. The supporters of the established religion accordingly applied to the diet at Warsaw; and, notwithstanding the powerful influence used in favor of the Socinians, a cruel edict was passed, abolishing their academy at Racow, banishing the learned men who had taught in it, breaking the printing-presses, and shutting up the churches. This edict was carried into effect with much severity; but it did not exhaust the enmity now cherished against the sect; for within a few years after, by a solemn act of the Polish diet, they were banished from the territories of the republic, and, with sad departure from the tolerant and beneficent spirit of the gospel, death was denounced against all who held their opinions, or who even sheltered and protected those who entertained them. A short time was allowed to the unfortunate victims to arrange their affairs before they bade an eternal adieu to scenes which all the ties of human life must have endeared to them; but this period was abridged. Some, however, had escaped the operation of the law, and had remained in Poland; but three years after, the edict was renewed, and the Socinians who still lingered in their beloved country were driven from it with a rigor and an inhumanity reflecting infamy upon those who were guilty of them, and leading to the most melancholy reflections upon that dismal perversion of all that is amiable in our nature, which has so often been effected by a mistaken zeal for a religion breathing the tenderest concern for the happiness of mankind. The principles of Socinus were, notwithstanding, secretly fostered, and various causes tended to perpetuate them even where in profession they were abjured. The propensity, so natural to man, of dissipating every shade of mystery, and casting the light of his own understanding around the subjects of his contemplation, did not cease to operate; and the application of this principle, so gratifying to the pride of human reason, carried many farther than even Socinus had probably anticipated.

The Socinians hold, that Jesus Christ was a mere man, who had no existence before he was born of the Virgin Mary; that the Holy Ghost is no distinct person; but that the Father only is truly and properly God. They own that the name of God is given in Scripture to Jesus Christ, but contend that it is only a deputed title; which, however, invests him with a great authority over all creatures. They deny the doctrine of satisfaction and imputed righteousness, and say that Christ only preached the truth to mankind, set before them in himself an example of heroic virtue, and sealed his doctrines with his blood. Original sin they esteem a mere scholastic chimera. Some of them, likewise, maintain the sleep of the soul, which, they say, becomes insensible at death, and is raised again with the body at the resurrection, when the good shall be established in the possession of eternal felicity, while the wicked shall be consigned to a fire that will torment them, not eternally, but for a certain duration, proportioned to their demerits. [See UNITARIANS.]

[SOCOH. See MAON.]

SODOM, the capital of Pentapolis, which for some time was the residence of Lot, the nephew of Abraham. The history of its destruction is given in the book of Genesis. See ABRAHAM, LOT, and DEAD SEA.

[SODOM, VINE OF. When speaking of the wickedness of the Israelites, Moses says, "Their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah: their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter: their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps." Deut. xxxii. 32, 33. By these metaphors he may have intended to say that the Israelites were as wicked as the Sodomites: a vine being metaphorical of a people, and its productions of their actions. But some suggest that he may have alluded to the grapes produced near the Dead Sea, which may have been of an acrid and unwholesome character. Michaelis thinks that the vine of Sodom is the solanum, or night-shade, which looks like the white vine in its leaves and fruit, which is vinous but poisonous, and is called by the Arabs "fox-grapes." Hasselquist says that not far from the Dead Sea he found in plenty the poma Sodomitica, or mad apples, which are the fruit of the solanum melongena Linnæi, a species of egg-plant. He says "they are sometimes filled with a dust, yet this is not always the case, but only when the fruit is attacked by an insect (tenthredo) which turns all the inside into dust, leaving the skin only entire, and of a beautiful color." Josephus, speaking of the destruction of the cities of the plain, says, "There are still to be seen ashes reproduced in the fruits, which indeed resemble edible fruits in color, but on being plucked with the hands, are dissolved into smoke and ashes." Wars, iv. 8. Tacitus, Hist., v. 7; Solinus, cap. 36; Brocardus, c. vii.; and others, allude to these fruits. Seetzen, however, A. D. 1806, suggested that the aöschär, or 'ösher, the asclepias gigantea vel procera of botanists, is the tree to which Josephus alludes. Irby and Mangles say there is little doubt of it. It is found from six inches to two feet in circumference, and from ten to fifteen feet in height. It has a cork-like bark and long oval leaves. It looks like a gigantic species of the milk-weed or silk-weed, and when its leaves or branches are broken off, discharges, like it, a milky fluid. The fruit is like a large smooth apple or orange, hanging in clusters of three or four together, and when ripe is of a yellow color. Dr. Robinson, who saw it at En-gedi in May, 1838, says, "It was now fair and delicious to the eye, and soft to the touch; but on being pressed or struck, it explodes with a puff, like a bladder or puff-ball, leaving in the hand only the shreds of the thin rind and a few fibres. It is indeed filled chiefly with air, like a bladder, which gives it the round form; while in the centre a small slender pod runs through it from the stem, and is connected by thin filaments with the rind. The pod contains a small quantity of fine silk with seeds; precisely like the pod of the silkworm, though very much smaller. The Arabs collect the silk and twist it into matches for their guns, preferring it to the common match, because it requires no sulphur to render it combustible." The solanum grows in various parts of Palestine: its fruit is much smaller than that of the 'ösher, and is filled with small black grains. It grows sometimes close by the 'ösher, which Robinson found in no part of Palestine, except near the Dead Sea. Lieut. Lynch found it, April 28, 1848, in the same neighborhood. He gathered some of its blossoms, and green and dried fruits, and says, "This fruit is doubtless the genuine apple of Sodom, for it is fair to the eye and bitter to the taste, and when ripe is filled with fibre and dust. Four jars, containing specimens, together with a drawing of the leaf and blossom, are placed in the patent office at Washington." He gives a minute description of the plant: Narrative, chap. xiv. The 'ösher, however, is not a vine, and therefore can scarcely be the plant to which Moses alludes, if, indeed, his language have any other than a metaphorical reference.]

[SOLITARIES. See MONK.]

SOLOMON, or SALOMON, son of David and Bathsheba, was born A. M. 2971. The Lord loved him, and sent Nathan to David to give Solomon the name of Jedidiah, or, "beloved of the Lord." 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25. This was probably when Nathan assured David that his son should succeed him, and that he should inherit those promises which had been made to him some years before, when he had conceived the design of building a temple to the Lord; for then God declared, by the prophet Nathan, that the honor of building a temple should be reserved for his son. 2 Sam. vii. 5, etc. Solomon, being confirmed in his kingdom, contracted an alliance with Pharaoh, King of Egypt, and married his daughter, A. M. 2291. He brought her to Jerusalem, and had apartments for her in the city of David, till he should build her a palace, which he did some years afterward, when he had finished the temple. It is thought that on occasion of this marriage, Solomon composed the Canticles, which are a kind of epithalamium. The Scripture speaks of the daughter of Pharaoh, as contributing to pervert Solomon, 1 Kings xi. 1, 2: Neh. xiii. 26; and it is very likely that if at first this princess might seem converted to the Lord, she afterward might retain her private disposition to idolatry, and might engage her husband in it.

Solomon, accompanied by his troops and all Israel, went up to Gibeon, where was then the brazen altar, upon which he offered a thousand burnt-offerings. The night following, God appeared to him in a dream, and said, "Ask of me what thou wilt." Solomon begged of God a wise and understanding heart, and such qualities as were necessary for the government of the people committed to him. This request pleased the Lord, and was fully granted by him. Solomon returned to Jerusalem, where he offered a great number of sacrifices on the altar before the ark of the Lord, and made a great feast for his servants. He enjoyed a profound peace throughout his dominions; Judah and Israel lived in security; and his neighbors either paid him tribute, or were his allies; he ruled over all the countries and kingdoms from the Euphrates to the Nile, and his dominions extended even beyond the former; he had abundance of horses and chariots of war; he exceeded the orientals, and all the Egyptians, in wisdom and prudence; he was the wisest of mankind, and his reputation was spread through all nations. He composed or collected three thousand proverbs, and one thousand and five canticles. He knew the nature of plants and trees, from the cedar on Libanus to the hyssop on the wall; also of beasts, of birds, of reptiles, of fishes. There was a concourse of strangers from all countries to hear his wisdom, and ambassadors from the most remote princes.

When Hiram, King of Tyre, knew that Solomon was made king of Israel, he sent ambassadors to congratulate him on his accession to the crown. Some time afterward, Solomon desired him to supply wood and workmen, to assist in building a temple to the Lord. Hiram gladly undertook this service, and Solomon, on his part, obliged himself to give twenty thousand measures of wheat, and twenty thousand measures of oil. The Hebrew and the Vulgate have only twenty measures of oil; but the reading ought, no doubt, to be twenty thousand. Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign, and the second after the death of David; four hundred and eighty years after the exodus from Egypt. He employed in this great work seventy thousand proselytes, descendants of the ancient Canaanites, in carrying burdens, four-score thousand in cutting stones out of the quarries, and three thousand six hundred overseers of the works; besides thirty thousand Israelites in the quarries of Libanus.

The temple was completed in the eleventh year of Solomon, so that he was but seven years in performing this vast work. The dedication was made the year following, A. M. 3001. To make this ceremony the more august, Solomon chose for it the eighth day of the seventh month of the holy year, which was the first of the civil year, and answered to our October. The ceremony of the dedication lasted seven days, at the end of which began the feast of tabernacles, which continued seven days longer; so that the people continued at Jerusalem fourteen or fifteen days, from the eighth to the twenty-second of the seventh month. When the ark was placed in the sanctuary, while the priests and Levites were celebrating the praises of the Lord, the temple was filled with a miraculous cloud, so that the priests could no longer stand to perform the functions of their ministry. Then Solomon, being on his throne, prostrated himself with his face to the ground; and rising up, and turning toward the sanctuary, he addressed his prayer to God, and besought him that the house which he had built might be acceptable to him, that he would bless and sanctify it, and hear the prayers of those who should address him from this holy place. He besought him also to fulfil the promises he had made to David his servant in favor of his family, and of the kings his successors. Then turning himself to the people, he solemnly blessed them. Fire coming down from heaven consumed the victims and burnt-sacrifices on the altar, and the glory of the Lord filled the whole temple. On this day the king caused to be sacrificed twenty-two thousand oxen, and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep, for peace-offerings. And because the altar of burnt-offerings was not sufficient for all these victims, the king consecrated the court of the people.

Solomon afterward built a palace for himself, and another for his queen, the King of Egypt's daughter. He was thirteen years in finishing these buildings, and employed in them whatever the most exquisite art, or the most profuse riches, could furnish. The palace in which he generally resided was called the house of the forest of Lebanon; probably because of the great quantity of cedar used in it. Solomon also built the walls of Jerusalem, and the place called Millo in this city; he repaired and fortified Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, the two Bethorons, Upper and Lower, Baalath, and Palmyra, in the desert of Syria. He also fortified the cities where he had magazines of corn, wine, and oil; and those where his horses and chariots were kept. He brought under his government the Hittites, the Hivites, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, which remained in the land of Israel. He made them tributaries, and compelled them to work at the public works. He fitted out a fleet at Ezion-geber, and at Elath, on the Red Sea, to go to Ophir. Hiram, King of Tyre, furnished him with mariners, who instructed the subjects of Solomon. They performed this voyage in three years, and brought back gold, ivory, ebony, precious wood, peacocks, apes, and other curiosities. In one voyage they brought Solomon four hundred and fifty talents of gold. 2 Chron. ix. 21. About the same time, the Queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem, attracted by the great fame of the king. She brought rich presents of gold, spices, and precious stones; and proposed several enigmas and hard questions, to which Solomon gave her such satisfactory answers, that she owned what had been told her of his wisdom and magnificence was far short of what she had found. The king, on his part, made her rich presents in return.

Solomon was one of the richest, if not the very richest, of all princes that have ever lived; and the Scripture expressly tells us he exceeded in riches and wisdom all the kings of the earth. His annual revenues were six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold, without reckoning tributes from kings and nations, or paid by Israelites, or sums received for customs. The bucklers of his guards, and the throne he sat on, were overlaid with gold. All the vessels of his table, and the utensils of his palaces, were of gold. From all parts he received presents, vessels of gold and silver, precious stuffs, spices, arms, horses, and mules; and the whole earth desired to see his face, and to hear the wisdom which God had put into his heart. But the latter actions of his life disgraced his character. Besides Pharaoh's daughter, he married wives from among the Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, Sidonians, and Hittites. He had seven hundred wives, who were so many queens, besides three hundred concubines. These women perverted his heart in his declining age, so that he worshipped Ash-toreth, goddess of the Sidonians, Molech, idol of the Ammonites, and Chemosh, god of the Moabites. To these he built temples on the Mount of Olives, over against and east of Jerusalem, and thus insulted openly the Majesty he had adored.

Solomon died after he had reigned forty years, A. M. 3029. He might be about fifty-eight years of age; for he was about eighteen when he began to reign. Josephus makes him to have reigned eighty years, and to have lived ninety-four years; but this is a manifest error. The history of this prince was written by the prophets Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo. He was buried in the city of David; and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead. Of all the ingenious works composed by Solomon, we have nothing remaining but his Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles; that is, every literary monument respecting him has perished, except those written under inspiration—the inspired history which registers his apostasy, and his own inspired works, which, in all the principles they contain, condemn his vices. Some have ascribed to him the book of Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus; but these were written by Hellenistic Jews.

[SONG OF SOLOMON. See CANTICLES.]

[SON OF GOD. Christ is called the Son of God because of his miraculous conception, Luke i. 35; his Divine commission, John x. 34-36; his resurrection, Acts xiii. 33: Rom. i. 4: compare Luke xx. 36: Col. i. 18; his heirship, Heb. i. 3-5—as the foregoing texts are generally interpreted; but he derives the title principally from his eternal generation, John iii. 16; v. 17-26: Heb. i. 6: 1 John iv. 9, 10. As the proper (ἰδιος, John v. 18: Rom. viii. 32) Son of God, he possesses an identity of nature with his Father; hence he is a Divine person, "God of God." See Pearson "on the Creed;" Watson's "Institutes;" Treffry on "Eternal Sonship;" and the article JESUS CHRIST.]

[SON OF MAN. A human being, Num. xxiii. 19.—A compellation of the prophet Ezekiel, Ezek. ii. 1, found in some eighty-nine places: it is applied once to Daniel, Dan. viii. 17.—It is applied more than eighty times to Christ in the New Testament, and once, perhaps, in Daniel, vii. 13, where it is Bar Enosh, not Ben Adam: it seems to indicate the essential humanity of Christ, as Son of God denotes his divinity: he is very God and very man.]

[SONS. Christians are called Sons of God, because of their ADOPTION and REGENERATION. John i. 12, 13: Rom. viii. 14-16. The phrase in Gen. vi. 2, is supposed by the Jews and some of the fathers to mean angels; others say, pious men, descendants of Seth; the Chaldees, sons of the eminent ones: as the name of God is used to predicate greatness of the subject with which it is connected, some critics think that these sons of God were mighty men, and that "the daughters of men" were women of the lower classes of society. Sons of Abraham, Gal. iii. 7, are the imitators of his faith and the inheritors of the promises made to him. Sons of the kingdom, Matt. viii. 12, or of the resurrection, Luke xx. 36, are the subjects thereof. Sons of peace, Luke x. 6, or of perdition, John xvii. 12, etc., are those liable to, or deserving thereof. Sons of the devil, Acts xiii. 10, of this world, Luke xvi. 8, etc., are those who possess the dispositions of the devil, world, etc. Compare 1 Sam. xx. 30.]

[SOOTHSAYING. Acts xvi. 16. See DIVINATION.]

[SOP. Σοπίον means a piece of any thing; in John xiii. 27, a piece of bread, or of the paschal lamb, dipped in the sauce.]

[SOPATER. Acts xx. 4. Some read, "Sopater, the son of Pyrrhus, of Berea." Conybeare and Howson suggest that Πύρρος was added to distinguish him from Sospater, Rom. xvi. 21, with whom he is generally identified.]

[SORCERY. Acts viii. 9. See DIVINATION and MAGICIAN.]

[SOREK. A valley near Gath, so called perhaps from its vines, which, from Isa. v. 2: Jer. ii. 21, Heb., appear to have been of the choicest kind. Some identify them with the sherki of Morocco.]

[SORTES SACRÆ. An imitation of the Sortes Virgilianæ. See BIBLIOMANCY.]

[SOSTHENES. The chief ruler of the synagogue at Corinth. Acts xviii. 17. Some think he was the colleague of Crispus; others, his successor after his conversion, verse 8; others, that he held office in another synagogue. It has been thought that the Greeks who beat Sosthenes were Jews—a suggestion favored by some MSS.; that they beat him for embracing Christianity; and that he is the Sosthenes mentioned, 1 Cor. i. 1.]

SOUL, that immortal, immaterial, active substance or principle in man, whereby he perceives, remembers, reasons, and wills. See MATERIALISM.

[The Hebrew word commonly rendered soul is נֶפֶשׁ, which comes from a root meaning to breathe, and is rendered breath, Job xli. 21: (12, Heb.): it is applied to any being or thing that has life, Gen. i. 20; ii. 7; xii. 5: Isa. x. 18; xix. 10, Heb.; even to God, Jer. li. 14, Heb.; to idols, made in imitation of living beings, Isa. xlv. 2, Heb.; to animal life, Lev. xxiv. 17, 18: Deut. xii. 23, where the blood is called the life, as it is called ψυχή and anima by the Greeks and Latins; to a dead body, because it has lived, Lev. xxi. 1, 11, Heb.; to the affections or appetites, Gen. xxxiv. 8: Prov. xiii. 4: Isa. i. 14; v. 14, Heb.; the spiritual essence of man, rendered mind, Gen. xxvi. 35, also xxxv. 18: 1 Kings xvii. 21, 22, where some render breath, and Psalm xvi. 10, where Parkhurst renders, "a breathing or animal frame," but Peter's comment seems to sustain the common view, Acts ii. 25-31. The Greek word commonly rendered soul, ψυχή, is a fair representative of naphash, having a similar etymology: it is applied to any living thing, Rom. xiii. 1: 1 Cor. xv. 45: Rev. xvi. 3; to life, Matt. vi. 25: Acts xv. 26: compare Rev. vi. 19, where there seems to be an allusion to the blood of sacrifices; to the affections, Acts iv. 32; xiv. 2: compare Matt. xxii. 37: 1 Thess. v. 23, where the soul is distinguished from the mind, heart, and spirit; to the spiritual essence, as distinct from the body, Matt. x. 28. נֶפֶשׁ, rendered souls, Isa. lviii. 16, is rendered breath, Gen. ii. 7; vii. 22; and spirit, Prov. xx. 27. See SPIRIT.]

[SOUTHCOTTIANS. Followers of Joanna Southcott, who was born in Devonshire, England, in 1750. While living in service at Exeter, she professed to converse with the devil and to be inspired by the Holy Ghost, and several clergymen of the Establishment affected to credit her professions. In 1792 she announced herself as the woman spoken of in Rev. xii., and predicted the speedy millennial advent of Christ. Her mission was recognized by some thousands of persons, to whom she distributed sealed packets, which were considered a guaranty of future salvation. She employed various agents, among whom was a boy who pretended to see visions, and to depict them on the walls of her temple. One of her followers, named Carpenter, took possession of "the house of God," as she called it, and headed a schism, on the ground that Joanna had exceeded her commission. Early in her last year she announced that she had conceived by the Holy Ghost, and was going to bring forth the promised Shiloh. As many of her predictions were given in doggerel rhymes and parodies of popular hymns, she issued a travesty of one of Wesley's hymns, making it pray that "the heavenly blessing lost by all mankind" might be brought back through her. She was to be delivered before harvest, then before Christmas, but, dying December 27, her followers asserted that the event would take place after her resurrection. A post mortem examination of her body was had in the presence of fifteen medical gentlemen, who testified that her apparent pregnancy was produced by flatulency, etc., occasioned by indolence and over-feeding. On her death-bed, Dr. Reece, one of her physicians, says she acknowledged that her pretended inspiration was a delusion; but one of her disciples replied, "Mother, we know that you are a favorite woman of God, and that you will produce the promised child; and whatever you may say to the contrary will not diminish our faith." Accordingly, they existed as a distinct sect long after her death, and four congregations of them were reported in the census of 1851. Whether or not they have preserved the splendid cradle and other presents given her for the "second Shiloh," is not stated.]

SOWING. Our Lord, in his parable of the sower, says, "Some seeds fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured them." Buckingham, in his Travels in Palestine, remarks, "We ascended to an elevated plain where husbandmen were sowing, and some thousands of starlings covered the ground, as the wild pigeons do in Egypt, laying a heavy contribution on the grain thrown into the furrows, which are not covered by harrowing, as in Europe." The sowing "beside all waters," mentioned by Isaiah, seems to refer to the sowing of rice, which is done on low grounds flooded, and prepared for sowing by being trodden by oxen and asses, mid leg deep; thus, they send "forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass."

[SPAIN. This was a Roman province in the time of Paul, and included the whole peninsula. Paul entertained the purpose of visiting Spain; (Rom. xv. 24, 28;) and if the fathers are to be credited, he carried it into effect. See Cave's "Lives of the Apostles." The name is said to come from the Hebrew shaphan—the Phenicians calling it Shaphanieh, Rabbit-land, from the multitudes of rabbits they found on its coasts.]

[SPAN. סוּר, Exod. xxxix. 9: 1 Sam. xvii. 4: Isa. xl. 12: Ezek. xliii. 13, means as much as a man can measure with his hand spread out: some rate it ten and a half inches. סוּסָה, Exod. xxv. 25: Psalm xxxix. 5, (6, Heb.,) means as much as a man can measure with his four fingers spread out—a handbreadth, three or four inches. The language in Lam. ii. 20, either means, "children a handbreadth long," i. e., abortions, or "children swaddled, or stretched out, by the hands of their mothers." Compare Isa. xlviii. 13: Lam. ii. 22, where the verb is used in this sense.]

SPARROW, סָרָסְרָא, Gen. vii. 14, and afterward frequently; σπρουβιον, Matt. x. 29: Luke xii. 6, 7: a little bird everywhere known. The Hebrew word is used not only for a sparrow, but for all sorts of clean birds, or for those the use of which was not forbidden by the law. That the sparrow was not intended in Psalm cii. 7, is evident from several circumstances; for that is intimated to be a bird of night, one that is both solitary and mournful; none of which characteristics is applicable to the sparrow, which rests by night, is gregarious and cheerful. It seems rather to mean a bird melancholy and drooping, much like one confined in a cage. See SWALLOW.

SPEECH. See LANGUAGE.

[SPICE. בְּשֵׁם. An aromatic, Exod. xxxv. 8, 28, or an odoriferous plant, Cant. iv. 14, 16; v. 13; viii. 14. בְּרִיחַ, 2 Kings xx. 13: Isa. xxxix. 2, rendered "precious things" in our version, and "spicery" in the margin, is rendered spices by Aquila and Symmachus. Compare Gen. xliii. 11. Spices, בְּשֵׁמִים, are specified among the things contained in the house, which Parkhurst suggests was the house where "the spices" were pounded, and "the silver and the gold" were beaten or stamped, the word being derived from רָבַב, to pound.]

SPIDER, עֲכָבִישׁ, Job viii. 14: Isa. lix. 5. An insect well known, remarkable for the thread which it spins, with which it forms a web of curious texture, but so frail that it is exposed to be broken and destroyed by the slightest accident. To the slenderness of this filmy workmanship, Job compares the hope of the wicked. This, says Dr. Good, was "doubtless a proverbial allusion; and so exquisite, that it is impossible to conceive any figure that can more fully describe the utter vanity of the hopes and prosperity of the wicked."

"Deceiving bliss! in bitter shame it ends,
His prop a cobweb, which an insect rends."

So Isaiah says, "They weave the web of the spider; of their webs no garment shall be made; neither shall they cover themselves with their works." [רְעָרְעָר, rendered spider, Prov. xxx. 28, is so called, according to some, because of the exact disposition of the threads of her web, the word coming from a root meaning to dispose with care. Bochart, favored by the καλαβύτης of the LXX. and stellio of the Vulgate, renders lizard.]

SPIKENARD, סִינְדוֹן. By this was meant a highly aromatic plant growing in the Indies, called "nardostachys" by Dioscorides and Galen; from whence was made the very valuable extract, or unguent, or favorite perfume, used at the ancient baths and feasts, unguentum nardinum, unguentum nardi spicatae, [the perfume or unguent of spikenard,] which it appears from a passage in Horace was so valuable, that as much of it as could be contained in a small box of precious stone was considered as a sort of equivalent for a large vessel of wine, and a handsome quota for a guest to contribute at an entertainment, according to the custom of antiquity:

Nardo vina merebere:

Nardi parvus onyx eliciet cadum.

"Bring you the odors, and a cask is thine.
Thy little box of ointment shall produce
A mighty cask."

FRANCIS.

St. Mark (xiv. 3) mentions "ointment of spikenard very precious," which is said to be worth more than three hundred denarii; and John (xii. 3) mentions a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly; the house was filled with the odor of the ointment; it was worth three hundred denarii. It is not to be supposed that this was a Syrian production, but the true "atar" of Indian spikenard; an unguent, containing the very essence of the plant, and brought at a great expense from a remote country.

SPIRIT, in Hebrew, רוּחַ, in Greek, πνεῦμα, and in Latin, spiritus, is in the Scriptures sometimes taken for the Holy Ghost, the third person of the Holy Trinity. The word signifies also the reasonable soul which animates us, and continues in existence even after the death of the body; that spiritual, thinking, and reasoning substance, which is capable of eternal happiness. Num. xvi. 22: Acts vii. 59. The term spirit is also often used for an angel, a demon, and a ghost, or soul separate from the body. It is said, in Acts xxiii. 8, that the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits. Jesus Christ appearing to his disciples, said to them, Luke xxiv. 39, "Handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." And St. Paul calls the good angels "ministering spirits." Heb. i. 14. In 1 Sam. xvi. 14; xviii. 10; xix. 9, it is said that an evil spirit from the Lord troubled Saul; and we have also the expression "unclean spirits." Add to this, spirit is sometimes put for the disposition of the heart or mind: see Num. v. 14: Zech. xii. 10: Luke xiii. 11: Isa. xi. 2. Discerning of spirits, or the secret character and thoughts of men, was a gift of God, and placed among the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost. 1 Cor. xii. 10: 1 John iv. 1. [See MIND, SOUL, and TRICHOTOMY.]

[SPIRITUALISM. The doctrine of the immateriality of the soul.—It also designates the theory that what is called the external world is either a succession of notions impressed on the mind by God, as held by Berkeley, or else the product of the mind itself, as held by Fichte and other German philosophers. See Buchanan on "Modern Atheism," and the article MATERIALISM.—The word has also been appropriated by the "Spirit-rappers." See NECROMANCY.]

[SPOILS. See BOOTY.]

[SPONGE. A marine substance, supposed to be of animal origin, found attached to rocks, and abounding in the Mediterranean. Being very porous and cellular, it can retain a large amount of liquid, and answered well for the purpose specified, Matt. xxvii. 48, where it is said to have been "put on a reed," while John (xix. 29) says it was "put upon hyssop:" the κάλυμπος was probably the stalk of the hyssop, which was sometimes two feet in length, long enough for the purpose, as the cross was not so high as is usually represented.]

[SPONSORS. See GODFATHERS.]

[SPORTÆ, SPORTULÆ. Fees paid to the clergy, so called perhaps from sportia, a basket in which the first-fruits were brought to the priests, Deut. xxvi.; or from sportula, the food distributed by patrons to their clients.]

[SPRINKLING. See BAPTISM and EXPIATION.]

[STACTE. סַתָּה, Exod. xxx. 34, like στακτή, in the LXX., comes from a root meaning to drop, and seems to mean the myrrh which drops from the tree of its own accord.]

[STANCARISTS. See OSIANDRIANS.]

STAR, in Hebrew, כוכב. Under the name of stars, the ancient Hebrews comprehended all the heavenly bodies, constellations, and planets; in a word, all the luminaries, the sun and moon excepted. The number of the stars was looked upon as infinite. And the Psalmist, to exalt the power and magnificence of God, says that he numbers the stars and calls them by their names; and so are they put to express a vast multitude, Gen. xv. 5; xxii. 17: Exod. xxxiii. 18.

[STAR IN THE EAST. This has been considered the Shekinah; the Holy Ghost; an angel; a spirit; a new star; a comet; a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, which, says Kepler, took place three times A. U. C. 747, a notion which Dr. Strong favors, only he thinks the star which reappeared to the wise men when they reached Bethlehem was something different, viz., a meteor. It is obvious, however, that that which they saw in the east was the same as that which they saw at Bethlehem. It was in all likelihood a luminous meteor, visible in the day as well as in the night, and called a star from its resemblance to one. It was, of course, supernaturally directed. The wise men may have been influenced by Balaam's prophecy concerning the "star of Jacob," Num. xxiv. 17, together with an inward Divine suggestion. Compare Matt. ii. 12. Sir Norton Knatchbull says, "That the star was and appeared locally in the east, and was not only seen at a far distance as far as Jerusalem of the wise men, who were in the east, as some do say, and that they followed it as their guide, I do most firmly believe with our most reverend primate." It is not likely, however, that the star was east of the wise men, but rather in a westerly direction, though both they and it were in the east when they saw it. Compare verse 1.

Some render ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ, at its rise; but, as Campbell says, "1. The words in that case ought to have been, ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ αὐτοῦ. 2. The term is never so applied in Scripture to any of the heavenly luminaries, except the sun. 3. It is very improbable that a luminous body, formed solely for guiding the Magians to Bethlehem, would appear to perform the diurnal revolution of the heavens from east to west." See MAGI.]

[STAROVERTZEE. See RASKOLNIKS.]

[STATIONARIL. Subdeacons who attended to public processions.—In the thirteenth century booksellers were called stationarii—hence our word stationers—from their stalls or stations, in the markets and church porches.]

[STATIONES. Fasts on Wednesdays and Fridays, so called from statio, a military guard.]

[STEPHANAS. A Christian, apparently of Corinth, whose family were baptized by Paul, being "the first-fruits of Achaia." 1 Cor. i. 16; xvi. 15-17. Some suggest that Epenetus belonged to this family, as he is called "the first-fruits of Achaia," though some copies read, Asia. Rom. xvi. 5.]

STEPHEN, the first martyr. He is always put at the head of the seven deacons; and it is believed he had studied at the feet of Gamaliel. As he was full of the Holy Ghost, and of zeal, Acts vi. 5, 6, etc., he performed many wonderful miracles; and those of the synagogue of the Libertines, of the Cyrenians, of the Alexandrians, and others, disputing with him, could not withstand the wisdom and the power with which he spoke. Then having suborned false witnesses, to testify that they had heard him blaspheme against Moses, and against God, they drew him before the sanhedrim. Stephen appeared in the midst of this assembly, with a countenance like that of an angel; and the high-priest asking him what he had to answer in his defence, he rapidly traced the history of the Jews, showing that they had always opposed themselves to God and his prophets; faithfully upbraided them with the hardness of their hearts, with their putting the prophets to death, and, lastly, with slaying Christ himself. At these words they were filled with rage, and gnashed their teeth against him. But Stephen, lifting up his eyes to heaven, calmly exclaimed, "I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God." Then the Jews cried out, and stopped their ears as though they had heard blasphemy, and falling on him, they drew him out of the city, and stoned him. The witnesses laid down their clothes at the feet of a young man called Saul, afterward St. Paul, who then appears to have commenced his career of persecution. "And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit; and he kneeled down and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this, he fell asleep:" an example of the majesty and meekness of true Christian heroism, and as the first, so also the pattern of all subsequent martyrs. His Christian brethren forsook not the remains of this holy man; but took care to bury him, and accompanied his funeral with great mourning. Acts viii. 2.

[STEPHEN'S DAY. December 26. It was observed in the east as early as the fourth century.]

[STOCKS. סֶכֶם, sad, Job xlii. 27; xxxiii. 11, seems to mean a clog or fetter. Ξύλον, Acts xvi. 24, was the nervus of the Romans: Plautus calls it ligna custodia—the “wooden Bastille” of Hudibras. The feet were constrained and bruised in this machine. Sometimes it had five holes, through which the head, hands, and feet were thrust.]

STOICS, a sect of heathen philosophers. Acts xvii. 18. Their distinguishing tenets were, that God is underived, incorruptible, and eternal; possessed of infinite wisdom and goodness; the efficient cause of all the qualities and forms of things; and the constant preserver and governor of the world: That matter, in its original elements, is also underived and eternal; and is by the powerful energy of the Deity impressed with motion and form: That though God and matter subsisted from eternity, the present regular frame of nature had a beginning originating in the gross and dark chaos, and will terminate in a universal conflagration, that will reduce the world to its pristine state: That at this period all material forms will be lost in one chaotic mass, and all animated nature be reunited to the Deity: That from this chaotic state, however, the world will again emerge by the energy of the efficient principle; and gods, and men, and all forms of regulated nature be renewed and dissolved in endless succession: And that, after the revolution of the great year, all things will be restored, and the race of men will return to life. Some imagined that each individual would return to his former body; while others supposed that similar souls would be placed in similar bodies. Those among the Stoics who maintained the existence of the soul after death, supposed it to be removed into the celestial regions of the gods, where it remains until, at the general conflagration, all souls, both human and divine, shall be absorbed in the Deity. But many imagined that, before they were admitted among the divinities, they must purge away their inherent vices and imperfections, by a temporary residence in some aerial regions between the earth and the planets. According to the general doctrine of the Stoics, all things are subject to a stern, irresistible fatality, even the gods themselves. Some of them explained this fate as an eternal chain of causes and effects; while others, more approaching the Christian system, describe it as resulting from the Divine decrees—the fiat of an eternal providence. Considering the system practically, it was the object of this philosophy to divest men of their passions and affections. They taught, therefore, that a wise man might be happy in the midst of torture; and that all external things were to him indifferent. Their virtues all arose from and centred in themselves; and self-approbation was their great reward.

[The founder of the Stoics was Zeno, who lived about three hundred years before Christ. His father, who was a merchant, brought him some books from Athens, which induced him to turn his attention to philosophy. He repaired to Athens, and taught his pantheistic system in the Stoa Pacile, or the Painted Porch, which had been the meeting-place of the poets. His followers derived their name from this circumstance. In conformity with his severe principles, he closed his life by suicide, as did Cleanthus, another leader of the Stoics, and Cato and Seneca, the two great Romans who embraced their system.]

[STOLE. A narrow scarf, with fringed extremities, worn by a priest over his shoulders, crossing his breast. It has been in use from the sixth century.]

STONE. This word is sometimes taken in the sense of rock, and is applied figuratively to God, as the refuge of his people. See ROCK. The Hebrews gave the name of “stones” to the weights used in commerce, no doubt because they were originally formed of stone. “Just weights” is, therefore, in Hebrew, “just stones.” “The corner-stone,” or “the head-stone of the corner,” is a figurative representation of Christ. It is the stone at the angle of a building, whether at the foundation or the top of the wall. Christ was that corner-stone, which, though rejected by the Jews, became the corner-stone of the Church, and the stone that binds and unites the synagogue and the Gentiles in the unity of the same faith. Some have thought the showers of stones cast down by the Lord out of heaven, mentioned several times in the Old Testament, to be showers of hail of extraordinary size; which was probably the case, as they even now sometimes occur in those countries in a most terrific and destructive form, and show how irresistible an agent this meteor is in the hands of an offended God. The knives of stone that were made use of by the Jews in circumcision, were not enjoined by the law; but the use of them was founded, either upon custom, or upon the experience that this kind of instrument is found to be less dangerous than those made of metal. Zipporah made use of a stone to circumcise her sons. Exodus iv. 25. Joshua (v. 2) did the same, when he caused such of the Israelites to be circumcised at Gilgal as had not received circumcision during their journey in the wilderness. The Egyptians, according to Herodotus, made use of knives of stone to open dead bodies that were to be embalmed; and Pliny assures us that the priests of the mother of the gods had sharp stones, with which they cut and slashed themselves, which they thought they could not do with any thing else without danger. Great heaps of stones, raised up for a witness of any memorable event, and to preserve the remembrance of some matter of great importance, are among the most ancient monuments. In those elder ages, before the use of writing, these monuments were instead of inscriptions, pyramids, medals, or histories. Jacob and Laban raised such a monument upon Mount Gilead in memory of their covenant, Gen. xxxi. 46. Joshua erected one at Gilgal, made of stones taken out of the Jordan, to preserve the memorial of his miraculous passage over this river. Josh. iv. 5-7. The Israelites that dwelt beyond Jordan also raised one upon the banks of the river, as a testimony that they constituted but one nation with their brethren on the other side. Josh. xxii. 10. Sometimes they heaped up such a collection of stones upon the burying-place of some odious persons, as was done in the case of Achan and Absalom. Josh. vii. 26: 2 Kings xviii. 17.

A "heart of stone" may be understood several ways. Job, (xli. 24,) speaking of the leviathan, says that "his heart is as firm as a stone; yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone;" that is, he is of a very extraordinary strength, boldness, and courage. It is said, 1 Sam. xxv. 37, that Nabal's heart died within him, and he became as a stone, when he was told of the danger he had incurred by his imprudence: his heart became contracted or convulsed, and this was the occasion of his death. Ezekiel (xxxvi. 26) says, that the Lord will take away from his people their heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh; that is, he will render them contrite, and sensible to spiritual things. "I will give him a white stone;" Rev. ii. 17; that is, I will give him full and public pardon and absolution. It is spoken in allusion to an ancient custom of delivering a white stone to such as they acquitted in judgment. They used likewise to give a white stone to such as conquered in the Grecian games.

[STONING. The mode by which idolaters and many other transgressors were put to death, Lev. xx. 2: Deut. xvii. 2-7; as also many of the martyrs, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21: Acts vii. 58; xiv. 19: Heb. xi. 37.]

STORK, דורסר, Lev. xi. 19: Deut. xiv. 18: Job xxxix. 13: Psalm civ. 17: Jer. viii. 7: Zech. v. 9: a bird similar to the crane in size, has the same formation as to the bill, neck, legs, and body, but is rather more corpulent. The color of the crane is ash and black; that of the stork is white and brown. The nails of its toes are also very peculiar; not being clawed like those of other birds, but flat like the nails of a man. It has a very long beak, and long red legs. It feeds upon serpents, frogs, and insects, and on this account might be reckoned by Moses among unclean birds. As it seeks for these in watery places, nature has provided it with long legs; and as it flies away, as well as the crane and heron, to its nest with its plunder, therefore its bill is strong and jagged, the sharp hooks of which enable it to retain its slippery prey. It has long been remarkable for its love to its parents, whom it never forsakes, but tenderly feeds and cherishes when they have become old, and unable to provide for themselves. The very learned and judicious Bochart has collected a variety of passages from the ancients, in which they testify this curious particular. Its very name in the Hebrew language, chasida, signifies mercy, or piety; and its English name is taken, if not directly, yet secondarily, through the Saxon, from the Greek word σπογγη, which is often used for natural affection.

The stork's an emblem of true piety;
Because, when age has seized and made his dam
Unfit for flight, the grateful young one takes
His mother on his back, provides her food;
Repaying thus her tender care of him
Ere he was fit to fly.

BEAUMONT.

It is a bird of passage, and is spoken of as such in Scripture: "The stork knoweth her appointed time." Jer. viii. 7.

Who bid the stork, Columbus-like, explore
Heavens not its own, and worlds unknown before?

Who calls the council, states the certain day,
Who forms the phalanx, and who points the way?—POPE.

Bochart has collected several testimonies of the migration of storks. Elian says that in summer-time they remain stationary, but at the close of autumn they repair to Egypt, Libya, and Ethiopia. "For about the space of a fortnight before they pass from one country to another," says Dr. Shaw, "they constantly resort together from all the adjacent parts in a certain plain, and there forming themselves, once every day, into a 'dow-wanne,' or council, (according to the phrase of these eastern nations,) are said to determine the exact time of their departure, and the place of their future abodes." See SWALLOW.

STRANGER. Moses inculcated and enforced by numerous and by powerful considerations, as well as by various examples of benevolent hospitality mentioned in the book of Genesis, the exhibition of kindness and humanity to strangers. There were two classes of persons who, in reference to this subject, were denominated strangers, גרים. One class were those who, whether Hebrews or foreigners, were destitute of a home, in Hebrew ערובים. The others were persons who, though not natives, had a home in Palestine; the latter were גרים, strangers, or foreigners, in the strict sense of the word. Both of these classes, according to the civil code of Moses, were to be treated with kindness, and were to enjoy the same rights with other citizens. Lev. xix. 33, 34; xxiv. 16, 22: Num. ix. 14; xv. 14: Deut. x. 18; xxiii. 7; xxiv. 17; xxvii. 19. In the earlier periods of the Hebrew state, persons who were natives of another country, but who had come, either from choice or from necessity, to take up their residence among the Hebrews, appear to have been placed in favorable circumstances. At a later period, namely, in the reigns of David and Solomon, they were compelled to labor on the religious edifices which were erected by those princes, as we may learn from such passages as these: "And Solomon numbered all the strangers that were in the land of Israel, after the numbering wherewith David his father had numbered them; and they were found a hundred and fifty thousand and three thousand and six hundred; and he set threescore and ten thousand of them to be bearers of burdens," etc. 1 Chron. xxii. 2: 2 Chron. ii. 1, 16, 17. The exaction of such laborious services from foreigners was probably limited to those who had been taken prisoners in war; and who, according to the rights of war, as they were understood at that period, could be justly employed in any offices, however low and however laborious, which the conqueror thought proper to impose. In the time of Christ the degenerate Jews did not find it convenient to render to the strangers from a foreign country those deeds of kindness and humanity which were not only their due, but which were demanded in their behalf by the laws of Moses. They were in the habit of understanding by the word רע, neighbor, their friends merely, and accordingly restricted the exercise of their benevolence by the same narrow limits that bounded in this case their interpretations, contrary as both were to the spirit of those passages which have been adduced above. Lev. xix. 18.

STREETS, CORNERS OF. Our Lord reproves the Pharisees for praying in the corners of the streets; that is, choosing public places for what ought to have been private devotion. The Hindoos, Mohammedans, and others, still have this practice. "Both Hindoos and Mussulmans offer their devotions in the most public places, as at the landing-places of rivers, in the public streets, and on the roofs of boats, without the least modesty or attempt at concealment." "An aged Turk," observes Richardson, "is particularly proud of a long flowing white beard, a well-shaved cheek and head, and a clean turban. It is a common thing to see such characters, far past the bloom of life, mounted on stone seats, with a bit of Persian carpet, at the corner of the streets, or in front of their bazaars, combing their beards, smoking their pipes, or drinking their coffee, with a pitcher of water standing beside them, or saying their prayers, or reading the Koran."

[STUDITÆ. Monks belonging to the Acœmetæ, or Watchers. Studius, a nobleman of Rome, of consular dignity, built a monastery which he called Studium—hence the name. They became Nestorians.]

STUMBLING, STONE OF. "We set out from Argos very early in the morning," says Hartley, "and were almost eleven hours in reaching Tripolizza. The road is, for the most part, dreary; leading over lofty and barren hills, the principal of which is Mount Parthenius. In England, where the roads are so excellent, we do not readily perceive the force and just application of the scriptural figures derived from a 'stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence,' Isaiah viii. 14, and similar passages; but in the east, where the roads are, for the most part, nothing more than an accustomed track, the constant danger and impediment arising to travellers from stones and rocks fully explain the allusion."

In the grand description which Isaiah gives, lxiii. 18, of God "with his glorious arm" leading his people through the Red Sea, it is said, "That led them through the deep, as a horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble;" that is, who preserved them from falling amidst the numerous inequalities in the bed of the sea, caused in some instances by deep cavities, and in others by abrupt intervening rocks. The figure is a very natural one, especially in the east, where the Arabs and Tartars are famed for their dexterity in the management of even bad horses. A curious instance of this occurs in Colonel Campbell's "Overland Journey to the East Indies." Speaking of the Tartar, an accredited courier of the Turkish government, under whose guidance he travelled in disguise across the desert from Aleppo to Mosul, he says, "One day, after riding about four miles from a caravansera at which we had changed our cattle, I found that a most execrably bad horse had fallen to my lot. He was stiff, feeble, and foundered, in consequence of which he stumbled very much, and I every minute expected that he would fall and roll over me. I therefore proposed to the guide to exchange with me—a favor which he had hitherto never refused, and for which I was the more anxious, as the beast that he rode was of the very best kind. To my utter astonishment, he peremptorily refused; and as this had been a day of unusual taciturnity on his part, I attributed his refusal to peevishness and ill-temper, and was resolved not to let the matter rest there. I therefore desired the interpreter to inform him, that as he had at Aleppo agreed to change horses with me as often as I pleased, I should consider our agreement infringed if he did not comply, and would write to the consul at Aleppo to that effect. As soon as this was conveyed to him he seemed strongly agitated by anger, yet endeavored to conceal his emotions under affected contempt and derision, which produced from him one of the most singular grins that ever yet marred the human physiognomy. At length he broke forth: 'You will write to Aleppo, will you? Foolish Frank! they will not believe you,' etc. 'Why do you not, then,' said I, interrupting him, 'why do you not perform your promise by changing horses, when you are convinced in your conscience (if you have any) that it was part of our agreement?' 'Once for all, I tell you,' interrupted he, 'I will not give up this horse. There is not,' said he, gasconadingly, 'there is not a Mussulman that ever wore a beard, not to talk of a wretched Frank, who should get this horse from under me. I would not yield him to the Commander of the Faithful this minute were he in your place; and I have my own reasons for it.' 'I dare say you have,' returned I; 'love of your ease, and fear of your bones.' At hearing this he grew quite outrageous; called Mohammed and Allah to witness that he did not know what it was to fear any thing; declared that he was convinced some infernal spirit had that day got possession of me, etc. At length observing that I looked at him with sneering, contemptuous defiance, he rode up alongside of me. I thought it was to strike, and prepared to defend myself. I was, however, mistaken: he snatched the reins out of my hand, and caught hold of them collected close at the horse's jaw, then began to flog my horse and to spur his own till he got them both into full speed; nor did he stop there, but continued to belabor mine with his whip, and to spur his own, driving headlong over every impediment that came in our way, till I really thought he had run mad, or designed to kill me. Several times I was on the point of striking him with my whip in order to knock him off his horse; but as often patience providentially came in to my assistance, and whispered to me to forbear, and see it out. Meantime I considered myself as being in some danger; and yet such was the power which he had over the cattle that I found it impossible to stop him. So, resigning the event to the direction of Providence, I suffered him, without a further effort, to proceed. He continued this for some miles over an uncultivated tract, here and there intersected by channels formed by rills of water in the periodical rains, thickly set with low furze, ferns, and other dwarf bushes, and broken up and down into little hills. His horse carried him clear over all; and though mine was every minute stumbling, and nearly down, yet, with a dexterity inexpressible, and a vigor altogether amazing, he kept him up by the bridle, and, I may say, carried him gallantly over every thing. At all this I was very much astonished, and, toward the end, as much pleased as astonished, which he perceiving, cried out frequently and triumphantly, 'Behold, Frank, behold!' and at last, drawing in the horses, stopping short, and looking me full in the face, he exclaimed, 'Frank, what say you now?' For some time I was incapable of making him any answer, but continued surveying him from head to foot as the most extraordinary savage I had ever beheld; while he stroked his whiskers with great self-complacency and composure, and nodded his head every now and then, as much as to say, 'Look at me! Am I not a very capital fellow?' We alighted on the brow of a small hill whence was to be seen a full and uninterrupted prospect of the country all round. The interpreter coming up, the Tartar called to him, and desired him to explain to me carefully the meaning of what he was about to say. 'You see those mountains,' said he, pointing to the east; 'they are in the province of Kurdistan, and inhabited by a vile race of robbers, who pay homage to a god of their own, and worship the devil from fear. They live by plunder, and often descend from those mountains, cross the Tigris, which runs between them and us, and plunder and ravage this country in bands of great number and formidable strength, carrying away into slavery all they can catch, and killing all who resist them. This country, therefore, for some distance round us, is very dangerous to travellers, whose only safety lies in flight. Now it was our misfortune this morning to get a very bad horse. Should we meet with a band of those Kurds, what could we do but fly? And if you, Frank, rode this horse, and I that, we could never escape; for I doubt you could not keep him up from falling under me, as I did under you. I should therefore come down and be taken: you would lose your guide and miss your way, and all of us would be undone.' As soon as the interpreter had explained this to me, 'Well,' continued the Tartar, 'what does he say to it now?' 'Why, I say,' returned I, 'that you have spoken good sense and sound reason; and I am obliged to you.' This, when fully interpreted, operated most pleasingly upon him, and his features relaxed into a broad look of satisfaction." [See OFFENCE.]

[STYLITES. Monks who lived on pillars.]

[SUB-DEACONS. Representatives and assistants of deacons. They were first mere sacristans; but afterwards they were permitted to engage in higher ministries, though never to distribute the eucharistic elements. They were divided into three classes. See PALATINI, REGIMONARII, and STATIONARII.]

[SUBLAPSARIANS. Those Calvinists who date the decree of predestination after the fall—sub lapsum—in opposition to the SUPRALAPSARIANS, who date it before the fall—supra lapsum. See CALVINISM.]

[SUCCOTH. This word means booths, and was given to a place in the tribe of Gad, east of Jordan, Judg. viii. 4–17, because Jacob "made booths" there. Gen. xxxiii. 17.—Also, the first encampment of the Israelites after they left Rameses. Exod. xii. 37.]

[SUFFRAGANS. Diocesan bishops, substitutes or assistants of the metropolitans, or archbishops. At the time of the Reformation, an Act was passed in England to restore the Chorepiscopi under this name. It was repealed in the reign of Mary, and revived in that of Elizabeth, but never carried out.]

[SUN. שֶׁמֶשׁ, Judges viii. 13; xiv. 18: Job ix. 7, the solar orb. שֶׁמֶשׁ, Exod. xvi. 21: Deut. iv. 19; xxxiii. 14: 1 Sam. xi. 9: Ps. xix. 4; (5, Heb.); cxxi. 6: Eccl. xi. 7: Isa. li. 19: Jonah iv. 8, the solar light. This is the word used when God, Ps. lxxxiv. 11, (12, Heb.;) Christ, Mal. iv. 2, (iii. 20, Heb.;) and the righteous, Judg. v. 31, are compared to the sun. It is also used Josh. x. 12, 13, which somewhat favors the notion that the day was prolonged not by arresting the solar orb, but by miraculously reflecting and refracting its light, so that it seemed to remain above the horizon: the corresponding word for the moon, יָרֵחַ, the lunar light, is used in connection with it. חֲמָשָׁה, Cant. vi. 10: Isa. xxiv. 23; xxx. 26, the solar fire. Compare Lev. xxvi. 30: 2 Chron. xiv. 5; xxxiv. 7: Isa. xvii. 8; xxvii. 9: Ezek. vi. 4, 6, where the chemarim seem to be sun-images. Baal, Molech, and Chemosh were all solar gods.]

[SUNISACTANISM. This word, meaning introduced with, designates that kind of concubinage which is sometimes called domesticism, superinduced by the forced celibacy of the clergy. It was denounced by the first Council of Nice and others. See Edgar's "Variations of Popery," and authorities there cited.]

[SUPEREROGATION. Works of supererogation are those good deeds which a man performs over and above what are required for his salvation. The merits of these works are distributed to those who need them, under certain conditions prescribed by the pope, in the form of indulgences. Protestants denounce this doctrine as arrogant and impious.]

[SUPERINTENDENT. This word, in its Latin form, superintendens, was sometimes used by the fathers for the Greek ἐπίσκοπος, both meaning an overseer. Thus Jerome renders ἐπίσκοπος, superintendentes, and says, unde et nomen episcopi tractum est,—whence the name bishop. At the time of the Reformation, those ministers in the Scottish kirk, and among the Lutherans, who were invested with the function of superintending other ministers, were called superintendents—the title of bishop, by long abuse, having lost its primitive signification. For a similar reason, some of the early Methodists preferred superintendent as the title of their chief ministers, and it is not unfrequently still used by Methodist writers as a synonym for bishops.]

[SUPERPOSITIO. A fast which lasted at least twenty-four hours.]

SUPERSTITION may be described to be either the careful and anxious observation of numerous and unauthorized ceremonies in religion, under the idea that they possess some virtue to propitiate God and obtain his favor, or, as among pagans and others, the worship of imaginary deities, and the various means of averting evil by religious ceremonies, which a heart oppressed with fears, and a perverted fancy, may dictate to those ignorant of the true God, and the doctrines of salvation. Dr. Neander observes: The consideration of human nature and history shows us that the transition from unbelief to superstition is always easy. Both these conditions of the human heart proceed from the self-same ground, the want of that which may be properly called faith, the want of a life in God, of a lively communion with Divine things by means of the inward life; that is, by means of the feelings. Man, whose inward feelings are estranged from the Divine nature, is inclined sometimes to deny the reality of that of which he has nothing within him, and for the conception and application of which to himself he has no organ. Or else, the irresistible force of his inward nature impels man to recognize that higher power from which he would fain free himself entirely, and to seek that connection with it which he cannot but feel needful to his comfort; but, inasmuch as he is without any real inward sympathy of disposition with the Divinity, and wants a true sense of holiness, the Divinity appears to his darkened religious conscience only under the form of power and arbitrary rule. His conscience paints to him this power as an angry and avenging power. But as he has no idea of that which the Divinity really is, he cannot duly understand this feeling of estrangement from God, this consciousness of Divine wrath, and, instead of seeking in moral things the source of this unquiet feeling, which leaves him no rest by day or night, and from which there is no escape, he fancies that by this or that action, which of itself is perfectly indifferent, he may have offended this higher power, and he seeks by outward observances again to reconcile the offended power. Religion here becomes a source, not of life, but of death; the source not of consolation and blessing, but of the most unspeakable anxiety which torments man day and night with the spectres of his own imagination. Religion here is no source of sanctification, but may unite in man's heart with every kind of untruth, and serve to promote it. There is one kind of superstition in which, while man torments himself to the utmost, he still remains estranged from the true nature of inward holiness; and while he is restrained from many good works of charity by his constant attendance on mischievous, arbitrary, and outward observances, he is still actuated by a horror of any great sin, a superstition in which a man avoids pleasure so completely that he falls into the opposite extreme; and even the most innocent enjoyments, which a childlike simplicity would receive with thankfulness from the hand of a heavenly Father, he dares not indulge in. But there is also another kind of superstition, which makes it easy for man, by certain outward observances, to silence his conscience under all kinds of sin, and which therefore serves as a welcome support to it.

SUPPER, LORD'S, derives its name from having been instituted by Jesus, after he had supped with his apostles, immediately before he went out to be delivered into the hands of his enemies. In Egypt, for every house of the children of Israel, a lamb was slain upon that night, when the Almighty punished the cruelty and obstinacy of the Egyptians by killing their first-born, but charged the destroying angel to pass over the houses upon which the blood of the lamb was sprinkled. This was the original sacrifice of the passover. In commemoration of it, the Jews observed the annual festival of the passover, when all the males of Judea assembled before the Lord in Jerusalem. A lamb was slain for every house, the representative of that whose blood had been sprinkled in the night of the escape from Egypt. After the blood was poured under the altar by the priests, the lambs were carried home to be eaten by the people in their tents or houses at a domestic feast, where every master of a family took the cup of thanksgiving, and gave thanks with his family to the God of Israel. Jesus having fulfilled the law of Moses, to which in all things he submitted, by eating the paschal supper with his disciples, proceeded after supper to institute a rite, which, to any person that reads the words of the institution without having formed a previous opinion upon the subject, will probably appear to have been intended by him as a memorial of that event which was to happen not many hours after. "He took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you." Luke xxii. 19, 20. He took the bread which was then on the table, and the wine, of which some had been used in sending round the cup of thanksgiving; and by saying, "This is my body, this is my blood, do this in remembrance of me," he declared to his apostles that this was the representation of his death by which he wished them to commemorate that event. The Apostle Paul, not having been present at the institution, received it by immediate revelation from the Lord Jesus; and the manner in which he delivers it to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xi. 23-26, implies that it was not a rite confined to the apostles who were present when it was instituted, but that it was meant to be observed by all Christians till the end of the world. "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come." Whether we consider these words as part of the revelation made to St. Paul, or as his own commentary upon the nature of the ordinance which was revealed to him, they mark, with equal significancy and propriety, the extent and the perpetuity of the obligation to observe that rite which was first instituted in presence of the apostles.

There is a striking correspondence between this view of the Lord's Supper, as a rite by which it was intended that all Christians should commemorate the death of Christ, and the circumstances attending the institution of the feast of the passover. Like the Jews, we have the original sacrifice: "Christ our passover is sacrificed for us," and by his substitution our souls are delivered from death. Like the Jews, we have a feast in which that sacrifice, and the deliverance purchased by it, are remembered. Hence the Lord's Supper was early called the eucharist, from its being said by St. Luke, "Jesus, when he took the bread, gave thanks;" and his disciples in all ages, when they receive the bread, keep a feast of thanksgiving. To Christians, as to Jews, there is "a night to be much observed unto the Lord," in all generations. To Christians, as to Jews, the manner of observing the night is appointed. To both it is accompanied with thanksgiving.

The Lord's Supper exhibits, by a significant action, the characteristic doctrine of the Christian faith, that the death of its author, which seemed to be the completion of the rage of his enemies, was a voluntary sacrifice, so efficacious as to supersede the necessity of every other; and that his blood was shed for the remission of sins. By partaking of this rite, his disciples publish an event most interesting to all the kindreds of the earth; they declare that, far from being ashamed of the suffering of their Master, they glory in his cross; and while they thus perform the office implied in that expression of the apostle, "Ye do show forth the Lord's death," they at the same time cherish the sentiments by which their religion ministers to their own consolation and improvement. They cannot remember the death of Christ, the circumstances which rendered that event necessary, the disinterested love and the exalted virtues of their deliverer, without feeling their obligations to him. Unless the vilest hypocrisy accompany an action, which, by its very nature, professes to flow from warm affection, the love of Christ will constrain them to fulfil the purposes of his death, by "living unto him who died for them;" and we have reason to hope, that in the places where he causes his name to be remembered, he will come and bless his people. As the object of faith is thus explicitly set before them in every commemoration, so the renewed exercise of that faith, which the ordinance is designed to excite, must bring renewed life, and a deeper experience of the "great salvation." See SACRAMENT.

[SUPRALAPSARIANS. See SUBLAPSARIANS.]

[SUPREMACY OF THE POPE. The sovereignty of the universal Church, arrogated by the Bishop of Rome. It was recognized by the Council of Lateran, A. D. 1215, and repudiated by the Reformers. In England the "Oath of Supremacy," in 1559, was connected with the "Act of Supremacy," entitled, "An Act for restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical, and abolishing all foreign power repugnant to the same." See ROMAN CATHOLICS.]

SURETY, in common speech, is one who gives security for another; and hence it has become prevalent among theological writers to confound it with the terms substitute and representative, when applied to Christ. In fact, the word "surety" occurs only once in our translation of the Scriptures, namely, Heb. vii. 22: "By so much was Jesus made the surety of a better covenant." It is certainly true that the Son of God, in all that he has done or is still doing as Mediator, may be justly viewed as the surety of the new and everlasting covenant, and as affording the utmost security to believers that, as the Father hath given all things into his hands, they will be conducted with effect, and all the exceeding great and precious promises of that covenant assuredly be accomplished. But this does not appear to be the precise idea which the apostle has in view in the above passage. This has been sufficiently evinced by many critics and commentators, particularly by Pierce, Macknight, and M'Lean, in their notes on the place. The substance of their remarks is, that the original term employed by the apostle, and which occurs nowhere else in Scripture, is ἐγγυος, which is derived from ἐγγύς, near, and signifies one who draws near, or who brings others near; which sense of the word will not very well accord with that of a substitute or representative. The Greek commentators very properly explain the word by μεσίτης, a mediator. Now, as in this passage a comparison is stated between Jesus, as a high-priest, and the Levitical high-priests; and as the latter were considered by the apostle to be the mediators of the Sinai covenant, because through their mediation the Israelites worshipped God with sacrifices; it is evident that the apostle in this passage terms Jesus the High-Priest or Mediator of the better covenant, because, through his mediation, or in virtue of the sacrifice which he offered of himself to God, believers receive all the blessings of the new covenant. And as in verse 16 the apostle had said that "by the introduction of a better hope we draw near to God," he, in verse 22, very properly calls Jesus ἐγγυος, "he by whom we draw nigh," thereby denoting the effect of his mediation. From the whole, therefore, it is plain that the word "surety" in this place is equivalent with that of mediator or high-priest.

[SURROGATE. A deputy, or substitute, of an ecclesiastical judge.]

SWALLOW, סִיס, a bird too well known to need description. Our translators of the Bible have given this name to two different Hebrew words. The first, דורר, in Psalm lxxxiv. 3, and Prov. xxvi. 2, is probably the bird which Forskal mentions among the migratory birds of Alexandria, by the name of dururi; and the second, עגור, Isa. xxxviii. 14, and Jer. viii. 7, is the crane; but the word סִיס, in the last two places rendered in our version "crane," is really the swallow. So the Septuagint, Vulgate, and two ancient manuscripts, Theodotion, and Jerome, render it, and Bochart and Lowth follow them. Bochart assigns the note of this bird for the reason of its name, and ingeniously remarks that the Italians about Venice call a swallow zizilla, and its twittering zizillare. The swallow being a plaintive bird, and a bird of passage, perfectly agrees with the meaning of Isaiah and Jeremiah. The annual migration of the swallow has been familiarly known in every age, and perhaps in every region of the earth. In Psalm lxxxiv. 3, it is said, "The sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts." By the altars of Jehovah we are to understand the temple. The words probably refer to the custom of several nations of antiquity, that birds which built their nests on the temples, or within the limits of them, were not suffered to be driven away, much less killed; but found a secure and uninterrupted dwelling. Hence, when Aristodicus disturbed the birds' nests of the temple of Kumæ, and took the young from them, a voice, according to a tradition preserved by Herodotus, is said to have spoken these words from the interior of the temple: "Most villainous of men, how darest thou to drive away such as seek refuge in my temple?" The Athenians were so enraged at Atarbes, who had killed a sparrow which built on the temple of Æsculapius, that they killed him. Among the Arabs, who are more closely related to the Hebrews, birds which build their nests on the temple of Mecca have been inviolable from the earliest times. In the very ancient poem of a Dschorhamidish prince, published by a Schulten, in which he laments that his tribe had been deprived of the protection of the sanctuary of Mecca, it is said,

"We lament the house, whose dove
Was never suffered to be hurt:
She remained there secure; in it, also,
The sparrow built its nest."

In another ancient Arabian poet, Nabega, the Dhobianit swears "by the sanctuary which affords shelter to the birds which seek it there." Niebuhr says, "I will observe, that among the Mohammedans, not only is the kaba a refuge for the pigeons, but also on the mosques over the graves of Ali and Hassein, on the Dsjamea, or chief mosque, at Helle, and in other cities, they are equally undisturbed." And Thevenot remarks; "Within a mosque at Oudjicun lies interred the son of a king, called Schah-Zadeh-Imam Dgiafer, whom they reckon a saint. The dome is rough-cast over; before the mosque there is a court, well planted with many high plane trees, on which we saw a great many storks, that haunt thereabout all the year round." See SPARROW.

SWAN, שׁוֹאֵן, Lev. xi. 18: Deut. xiv. 16. The Hebrew word is very ambiguous, for in the first of these places it is ranked among water-fowls; and by the Vulgate, which our version follows, rendered "swan," and in the thirtieth verse the same word is rendered "mole," and ranked among reptiles. Some translate it in the former place, "the bat," which they justify by the affinity which there is between the bat and the mole. The LXX. in the former verse render it πορφύρινα, the porphyryion, or "purple bird," probably the "flamingo;" and in the latter, "ibis." Parkhurst shows that the name is given from the creature's breathing in a strong and audible manner; and Michaelis learnedly conjectures, that in verse eighteen, and Deut. xiv. 16, it may mean the "goose," which every one knows is remarkable for its manner of "breathing out" or "hissing," when approached.

SWEDENBORGIANs denote that particular denomination of Christians who admit the testimony of Baron Swedenborg, and receive the doctrines taught in the theological writings of that author. Emanuel Swedenborg was the son of a bishop of West Gothnia, in the kingdom of Sweden, whose name was Swedberg, a man of considerable learning and celebrity in his time. The son was born at Stockholm, January 29, 1688. He enjoyed early the advantages of a liberal education, and being naturally endowed with uncommon talents for the acquirement of learning, his progress in the sciences was rapid and extensive; and he soon distinguished himself by several publications in the Latin language, which gave proof of equal genius and erudition. It may reasonably be supposed that, under the care of his pious and reverend father, our author's religious instruction was not neglected. This, indeed, appears plain from the general tenor of his life and writings, which are marked with strong and lively characters of a mind deeply impressed with a sense of the Divine Being, and of all the relative duties thence resulting. He was ennobled in the year 1719, by Queen Ulrica Eleonora, and named Swedenborg, from which time he took his seat with the nobles of the equestrian order, in the triennial assembly of the states. The philosophical works, published in Latin, by Baron Swedenborg, are numerous; but his theological works are said to be still more so.

1. The first and principal distinguishing doctrine contained in the writings of Baron Swedenborg, and maintained by his followers, relates to the person and character of Jesus Christ, and to the redemption wrought by him. On this subject it is insisted that Jesus Christ is Jehovah, manifested in the flesh; and that he came into the world to glorify his human nature, by making it one with the Divine. It is therefore insisted further that the humanity of Jesus Christ is itself Divine, by virtue of its indissoluble union with the indwelling Father, agreeably to the testimony of St. Paul, that "in Jesus Christ dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," Col. ii. 9; and that thus, as to his humanity, he is the Mediator between God and man, since there is now no other medium of God's access to man, or of man's access to God, but this Divine humanity, which was assumed for this purpose. Thus it is taught, that in the person of Jesus Christ dwells the whole Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the Father constituting the soul of the above humanity, while the humanity itself is the Son, and the Divine virtue or operation proceeding from it is the Holy Spirit; forming altogether one God, just as the soul, the body, and operation of man, form one man. On the subject of redemption wrought by this incarnate God, it is lastly taught that it consisted not in the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, but in the real subjugation of the powers of darkness and their removal from man, by continual combats and victories over them, during his abode in the world; and in the consequent descent to man of Divine power and life, which was brought near to him in the thus glorified humanity of this victorious God. They who receive this testimony concerning Jesus Christ therefore acknowledge no other God but him; and believe that in approaching his Divine humanity, they approach, at the same time, and have communication with, all the fulness of the Godhead, seeing and worshipping the invisible in the visible, agreeably to the tenor of those words of Jesus Christ: "He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me; and he that seeth me, seeth him that sent me." John xii. 44, 45.

2. A second doctrine taught by the same author relates to the Sacred Scripture, or word of God, which is maintained to be Divinely inspired throughout, and, consequently, to be the repository of the whole will and wisdom of the most high God. It is, however, insisted, that this will and wisdom are not in all places discoverable from the letter or history of the sacred pages, but lie deeply concealed under the letter. For it is taught by Baron Swedenborg, that the sense of the letter of the holy word is the basis, the continent, and the firmament, of its spiritual and celestial senses, being written according to the doctrine of correspondencies between things spiritual and things natural, and thus designed by the Most High as the vehicle of communication of the eternal spiritual truths of his kingdom to the minds of men. It is further endeavored to be shown that Jesus Christ spake continually according to this same doctrine, veiling divine and spiritual truths under natural images, especially in his parables, and thus communicating to man the most important mysteries relative to himself and his kingdom, under the most beautiful and edifying figures taken from the natural things of this world. Thus, according to Baron Swedenborg, even the historical parts both of the Old and New Testament contain vast stores of important and spiritual wisdom under the outward letter; and this consideration, as he further asserts, justifies the pages of Divine revelation, even in those parts which to a common observer appear trifling, nugatory, and contradictory. It is lastly maintained, on this subject, that the Sacred Scripture, or word of God, is the only medium of communication and conjunction between God and man, and is likewise the only source of all genuine truth and knowledge respecting God, his kingdom, and operation, and the only sure guide for man's understanding, in whatever relates to his spiritual or eternal concerns.

3. The next branch of the system is practical, and relates to the life, or to that rule of conduct on the part of man which is truly acceptable to the Deity, and at the same time conducive to man's eternal happiness and salvation, by conjoining him with his God. This rule is taught to be simply this: to shun all known evils as sins against God, and at the same time to love, to cherish, and to practice whatsoever is wise, virtuous, and holy, as being most agreeable to the will of God, and to the spirit of his precepts. On this subject it is strongly and repeatedly insisted that evil must of necessity remain with man, and prove his eternal destruction, unless it be removed by sincere repentance, leading him to note what is disorderly in his own mind and life; and, when he has discovered it, to fight resolutely against its influence, in dependence on the aid and grace of Jesus Christ. It is insisted further, that this opposition to evil ought to be grounded on the consideration that all evil is against God, since, if evil be combated from any inferior motive, it is not radically removed, but only concealed, and on that account is even more dangerous and destructive than before. It is added, that when man has done the work of repentance, by shunning his hereditary evils as sins against God, he ought to set himself to the practice of what is wise and good by a faithful, diligent, and conscientious discharge of all the duties of his station; by which means his mind is preserved from a return of the power of disorder, and kept in the order of heaven, and the fulfilment of the great law of charity.

4. A fourth doctrine inculcated in the same writings, is the coöperation on the part of man with the Divine grace or agency of Jesus Christ. On this subject it is insisted that man ought not indolently to hang down his hands, under the idle expectation that God will do every thing for him in the way of purification and regeneration, without any exertion of his own; but that he is bound by the above law of coöperation to exert himself, as if the whole progress of his purification and regeneration depended entirely on his own exertions; yet, in exerting himself, he is continually to recollect, and humbly to acknowledge, that all his power to do so is from above, agreeably to the declaration of Jesus Christ, "Without me ye can do nothing." John xv. 5.

5. A fifth and last distinguishing doctrine taught in the theological writings of our author, relates to man's connection with the other world, and its various inhabitants. On this subject, it is insisted, not only from his view of the Sacred Scriptures, but also from the experience of the author himself, that every man is in continual association with angels and spirits, and that without such association he could not possibly think or exert any living faculty. It is insisted further, that man, according to his life in the world, takes up his eternal abode, either with angels of light, or with the spirits of darkness: with the former, if he is wise to live according to the precepts of God's holy word; or with the latter, if, through folly and transgression, he rejects the counsel and guidance of the Most High.

Some other peculiar doctrines of minor importance might be enlarged on in this place if it were deemed necessary; such as the doctrine concerning the human soul, as being in a human form; concerning the marriage of the good and the true, as existing in the holy word, and in all things in nature. But it may be observed generally, that the fundamental error of the system is a denial of the Divinity of Christ, while it appears to be acknowledged, and of the doctrine of the atonement. Many true things are said also of the figurative and typical character of the word of God; but the interpretation of it in this view runs into the wildest extravagance for want of principles; while the whole is clothed with mysticism on the one hand, and gross and carnal conceptions of spiritual things on the other. There is, indeed, much in which this sect agrees with other Christians, and much, therefore, that is true in their strange system; but it is unconnected with other great and vital truths of the gospel; and is joined also with great errors. It is a dreamy delusion, which defies all rational defence: it rests upon the assumed experience of a man of genius, it is true, but one who was not always in his wits.

In London, and some of the other cities and great towns in England, places of public worship have been opened, for the express purpose of preaching the preceding doctrines. In all such places particular forms of prayer have been adopted, in agreement with the ideas of the worshippers, as grounded in the religious sentiments above stated, especially respecting the supreme object of adoration, who is acknowledged to be the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in his Divine humanity. But in no place have any peculiar rites and ceremonies been introduced, the worshippers being content with retaining the celebration of the two sacraments of baptism and the holy supper, since no other rites are insisted on by the author whose testimony they receive. It is believed, by a large majority of them, that it was never his intention that any particular sect should be formed upon his doctrines, but that all who receive them, whether in the establishment or in any other communion of Christians, should be at perfect liberty either to continue in their former communion, or to quit it, as their conscience dictates. England appears to be the country where the system has been most generally received. Baron Swedenborg had many eccentricities; but perhaps the most remarkable circumstance respecting him was his asserting that, during the uninterrupted period of twenty-seven years, he enjoyed open intercourse with the world of departed spirits, and during that time was instructed in the internal sense of the Sacred Scriptures, hitherto undiscovered! This is a correspondence with the invisible world to which few or no writers, before or since his time, ever pretended, if we except the Arabian prophet.

[The Swedenborgians desire to be recognized as "The New Church," or "The New Jerusalem Church." They think that the Last Judgment took place in 1757, when the New Jerusalem descended, in the form of the New Church. Swedenborg died in London, A. D. 1772, and eleven years after an advertisement brought together five persons to study his writings; in 1787, they had increased to thirty. About that time they formed a definite society, with provision for ministerial ordination and religious worship. Two divines of the Church of England were among the first disciples—Thomas Hartley, who translated Swedenborg's "Heaven and Hell," and John Clowes, who translated his "Arcana Cœlestia." The "Swedenborg Printing Society" was established in 1810, and the "Missionary and Tract Society" in 1821: the income of the former in 1852-3 was £338, of the latter £235. The affairs of the New Church are managed by a Conference, composed of ministers and laymen. They have a Liturgy, containing hymns and prayers suited to their opinions. They administer Baptism and the Lord's Supper, attributing to these ordinances a peculiar mystical design. Swedenborg shuts the Quakers out of heaven, lets the Moravians look in at the door, and allows those who enter to live together according to their respective nations, putting the English in the centre, because of their liberality. All trades and domestic habits will be perpetuated in heaven—notwithstanding the proper resurrection of the body is repudiated in his system. The Census of 1851 reports fifty congregations of the New Church in England and Wales, with an average attendance of some seventy persons at each meeting. It is thought that some not ostensibly connected with the New Church entertain its leading doctrines. They have some forty-five churches, thirty-five ministers, ten thousand adherents, and two or three periodicals, in the United States. Dr. Bush, of New York, is said to be their ablest writer.]

SWINE, חזיר, Lev. xi. 7: Deut. xiv. 8: Psalm lxxx. 18: Prov. xi. 22: Isaiah lxx. 4; lxxi. 3, 17: χοῖρος, Matt. vii. 6; viii. 30: Mark v. 14: Luke viii. 33; xv. 15: the plural of hog, an animal well known. In impurity and grossness of manners, this creature stands almost unrivalled among the order of quadrupeds; and the meanness of his appearance corresponds to the grossness of his manners. He has a most indiscriminate, voracious, and insatiable appetite. The prophet Isaiah (lxx. 4) charges his degenerate people with eating swine's flesh, and having broth of abominable things in their vessels. Isaiah lxxi. 3. Conduct so contrary to their solemn engagements, so hateful in the sight of the Holy One, though long endured, was not always to pass with impunity. "They that sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens behind one tree in the midst, eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the Lord." Isaiah lxxi. 17. Such a sacrifice was an abomination to the Lord, because the eating of the blood was prohibited, and because the sacrifice consisted of swine's flesh. To these precepts and threatenings, which were often enforced by severe judgments, may be traced the habitual and unconquerable aversion of the latter Jews to the use of swine's flesh; an aversion which the most alluring promises and the most cruel sufferings have been found alike insufficient to subdue.

In such detestation was the hog held by the Jews, that they would not so much as pronounce its name, but called it "the strange thing;" and we read in the history of the Maccabees, that Eleazer, a principal scribe, being compelled by Antiochus Epiphanes to open his mouth and receive swine's flesh, spit it forth, and went of his own accord to the torment, choosing rather to suffer death than to break the law of God, and give offence to his nation. 2 Macc. vi. 18; vii. 1. It is observed that when Adrian rebuilt Jerusalem, he set up the image of a hog, in bas-relief, upon the gates of the city, to drive the Jews away from it, and to express the greater contempt for that miserable people. It was avarice, a contempt of the law of Moses, and a design to supply the neighboring idolaters with victims, that caused whole herds of swine to be fed on the borders of Galilee. Whence the reason is plain of Christ's permitting the devils to throw the swine headlong into the lake of Gennesaret. Matt. viii. 32. We read, in Matthew vii. 6, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you." There is a similar maxim in the Talmudical writings: "Do not cast pearls before swine;" to which is added, by way of explanation, "Do not offer wisdom to one who knows not the value of it, but profanes its glory."

SYCAMINE, συκάμινος, in Arabic sokam, Luke

xvii. 6 This is a different tree from the sycamore, mentioned Luke xix. 4. Dioscorides says that this tree is the mulberry, though he allows that some apprehend that it is the same with the sycamore. Galen has a separate article on the sycamorus, which he speaks of as rare, and mentions as having seen it at Alexandria in Egypt. The Greeks name the morus the sycamine. Grotius says the word συκάμυρος has no connection with συκή, the fig-tree, but is entirely Syrian, שמקם, in Hebrew, and שקמים. It should seem, indeed, to be very similar to the mulberry, as not only the Latin, but the Syriac and the Arabic, render it by morus; and thus Coverdale's, the Rheims', and Purver's English translations render it by the mulberry; and so it is in Bishop Wilson's Bible.

SYCAMORE, שקמים, שקמים, 1 Kings x. 27: 1 Chron. xxvii. 28: 2 Chron. i. 15: Ps. lxxviii. 47: Isa. ix. 9: Amos vii. 14: συκομορέα, Luke xix. 4: a large tree, according to the description of Theophrastus, Dioscorides, and Galen, resembling the mulberry-tree in the leaf, and the fig in its fruit; hence its name, compounded of συκή, fig, and μόρος, mulberry; and some have fancied that it was originally produced by engrafting the one tree upon the other. Its fruit is palatable. When ripe it is soft, watery, somewhat sweet, with a little of an aromatic taste. The trees are very common in Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt; grow large and to a great height; and though their grain is coarse, are much used in building. To change sycamores into cedars, Isa. ix. 10, means, to render the buildings of cities, and the state of the nation, much more magnificent than before. Dr. Shaw remarks, that as the grain and texture of the sycamore are remarkably coarse and spongy, it could therefore stand in no competition at all with the cedar for beauty and ornament. We meet with the same opposition of cedars to sycamores in 1 Kings x. 27, where Solomon is said to have made silver as the stones, and cedars as the sycamores of the vale for abundance. "By this marshal, or figurative and sententious speech," says Bishop Lowth, "they boast, in this place of Isaiah, that they shall be easily able to repair their present losses, suffered, perhaps, by the first Assyrian invasion under Tiglath-pileser, and to bring their affairs to a more flourishing condition than ever." The wood of this tree is very durable. "The mummy chests," says Dr. Shaw, "and whatever figures and instruments of wood are found in the catacombs, are all of them of sycamore, which, though spongy and porous to appearance, has, notwithstanding, continued entire and uncorrupted for at least three thousand years. From its value in furnishing wood for various uses, from the grateful shade which its wide-spreading branches afforded, and on account of the fruit, which, Mallet says, the Egyptians hold in the highest estimation, we perceive the loss which the ancient inhabitants of Egypt must have felt when their vines were destroyed with hail, and their sycamore trees with frost." Psalm lxxviii. 47. "The sycamore," says Mr. Norden, "is of the height of a beech, and bears its fruit in a manner quite different from other trees; it has them on the trunk itself, which shoots out little sprigs, in form of grape stalks, at the end of which grow the fruit close to one another, almost like clusters of grapes. The tree is always green, and bears fruit several times in the year, without observing any certain seasons; for I have seen some sycamores that have given fruit two months after others. The fruit has the figure and smell of real figs, but is inferior to them in the taste, having a disgusting sweetness. Its color is a yellow, inclining to an ochre, shadowed by a flesh color. In the inside it resembles the common figs, excepting that it has a blackish coloring with yellow spots. This sort of tree is pretty common in Egypt; the people, for the greater part, live upon its fruit, and think themselves well regaled when they have a piece of bread, a couple of sycamore figs, and a pitcher of water." There might be many of these trees in Judea. David appointed a particular officer, whose sole duty it was to watch over the plantations of sycamore and olive trees, 1 Chron. xxvii. 28; and being joined with the olive, the high estimation in which it was held is intimated, for the olive is considered as one of the most precious gifts which the God of nature has bestowed on the oriental nations. There seem to have been great numbers of them in Solomon's time, 1 Kings x. 27; and in the Talmud they are mentioned as growing in the plains of Jericho.

One curious particular in the cultivation of the fruit must not be passed over. Pliny, Dioscorides, and Theophrastus observe that the fruit must be cut or scratched, either with the nail or with iron, or it will not ripen; but four days after this process it will become ripe. To this same purpose Jerome, on Amos vii. 14, says, that without this management the figs are excessively bitter. These testimonies, together with the Septuagint and Vulgate version, are adduced to settle the meaning of the word בִּילֵשׁ, in Amos vii. 14, which must signify scraping, or making incisions in the sycamore fruit, an employment of Amos before he was called to the prophetic office: "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was a herdman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit." Hasselquist, describing the ficus sycamorus, or Scripture sycamore, says, "It buds the latter end of March, and the fruit ripens in the beginning of June. At the time when the fruit has arrived to the size of an inch diameter, the inhabitants pare off a part at the centre point. They say that without this paring it would not come to maturity." The figs thus prematurely ripened are called djumeis bædri, that is, "precocious sycamore figs." As the sycamore is a large spreading tree, sometimes shooting up to a considerable height, we see the reason why Zaccheus climbed up into a sycamore tree to get a sight of our Saviour. This incident also furnishes a proof that the sycamore was still common in Palestine; for this tree stood to protect the traveller by the side of the highway.

[SYCHAR, SYCHEM. See SHECHEM.]

SYENE, a city of Egypt, now called Assouan, situated at its southern extremity. Ezekiel, (xxix. 10,) describing the desolation, to be brought upon Egypt, says, "Therefore thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will make the land of Egypt utterly desolate, from the tower of Syene even to the border of Cush," or Arabia, or, as some read it, "from Migdol to Syene," implying, according to either version of the passage, the whole length of the country from north to south. The latitude of Syene, according to Bruce, is $24^{\circ} 0' 45''$; that of Alexandria, $31^{\circ} 11' 33''$; difference, $7^{\circ} 10' 48''$, equal to four hundred and thirty geographical miles on the meridian, or about five hundred British miles; but the real length of the valley of Egypt, as it follows the windings of the Nile, is full six hundred miles. [The granite or syenite quarries, which furnished materials for many of the monuments of Egypt, are at this place, where there are some remains of the ancient city. Assouan has a small trade in Abyssinian slaves, henna, senna, dates, etc.]

[SYMBOL. See CONFESSION OF FAITH.]

[SYMPOSIA. Love-Feasts.]

SYNAGOGUE, συναγωγή, "an assembly." Rev. ii. 9; iii. 9. The word often occurs in the Gospels and in the Acts, because Jesus Christ and his apostles generally went to preach in synagogues. Although the sacrifices could not be offered except in the tabernacle or the temple, the other exercises of religion were restricted to no particular place. Accordingly we find that the praises of God were sung, at a very ancient period, in the schools of the prophets; and those who felt any particular interest in religion were assembled by the seers on the Sabbath, and the new moons, for prayers and religious instruction. 1 Sam. x. 5-11; xix. 18-24: 2 Kings iv. 23. During the Babylonish captivity, the Jews, who were then deprived of their customary religious privileges, were wont to collect around some prophet or other pious man, who taught them and their children in religion, exhorted to good conduct, and read out of the sacred books. Ezek. xiv. 1; xx. 1: Dan. vi. 11: Neh. viii. 18. These assemblies or meetings became, in progress of time, fixed to certain places, and a regular order was observed in them. Such appears to have been the origin of synagogues. In speaking of synagogues, it is worthy to be noticed, that there is nothing said in respect to the existence of such buildings in Palestine, during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. They are therefore by some supposed to have been first erected under the Maccabean princes, but that in foreign countries they were much more ancient. Whether this statement be correct or not, it is nevertheless certain, that in the time of the apostles there were synagogues wherever there were Jews. They were built in imitation of the temple of Jerusalem, with a court and porches, as is the case with the synagogues in the east at the present day. In the centre of the court is a chapel, supported by four columns, in which, on an elevation prepared for it, is placed the book of the law, rolled up. This, on the appointed days, is publicly read. In addition to the chapel, there is erected within the court a large covered hall, or vestry, into which the people retire when the weather happens to be cold and stormy, and each family has its particular seat. The uppermost seats in the synagogue, that is, those which were nearest the chapel where the sacred books were kept, were esteemed peculiarly honorable. Matt. xxiii. 6: James ii. 3. The "proseuchæ," προσευχή, are understood by some to be smaller synagogues, but by others are supposed to be particular places under the open sky, where the Jews assembled for religious exercise. But Josephus calls the proseucha of Tiberias a large house, which held very many persons. (See PROSEUCHÆ.) The apostles preached the gospel in synagogues and proseuchæ, and, with their adherents, performed in them all the religious services. When excluded, they imitated the Jews in those places where they were too poor to erect these buildings, and held their religious meetings in the houses of individuals. Hence we not only hear of synagogues in houses in the Talmud, but of churches in houses in the New Testament. Rom. xvi. 5: 1 Cor. xvi. 19: Col. iv. 15: Philemon 2: Acts iii. 46; v. 42. The apostles sometimes hired a house in which they performed religious services, and taught daily. Acts xix. 9; xx. 8. Συναγωγή means, literally, a convention, or assembly; but, by metonymy, was eventually used for the place of assembling; in the same way that ἐκκλησία, which means, literally, a calling together, or convocation, signifies also, at the present time, the place of convocation. Synagogues were sometimes called by the Jews, schools; but they were careful to make an accurate distinction between such and the schools, properly so called, by בית-הספר, or "sublimar schools," in which the Talmud was read, while the law merely was read in the synagogues, which they placed far behind the Talmud.

The mode of conducting religious instruction and worship in the primitive Christian churches was derived, for the most part, from the practice which anciently prevailed in synagogues. But there were no regular teachers in the synagogues who were officially qualified to pronounce discourses before the people; although there were interpreters who rendered into the vernacular tongue, namely, the Hebræo-aramæan, the sections which had been publicly read in the Hebrew.

The "synagogue preacher," דרשן, whose business it is, in consequence of his office, to address the people, is an official personage that has been introduced in later times; at least, we find no mention of such a one in the New Testament. On the contrary, in the time of Christ, the person who read the section for the Sabbath, or any other person who was respectable for learning and had a readiness of speech, addressed the people. Luke iv. 16-21: Acts xiii. 5, 15; xv. 21: Matt. iv. 23.

The other persons who were employed in the services and government of the synagogue, in addition to the one who read the Scriptures, and the person who rendered them into the vernacular tongue, were as follows: 1. "The ruler of the synagogue," ἀρχισυναγωγος, ראש הכנסת, who presided over the assembly, and invited readers and speakers, unless some persons who were acceptable voluntarily offered themselves. Mark v. 22 35-38: Luke viii. 41; xiii. 14, 15: Acts xiii. 15. 2. "The elders of the synagogue," ἡγούμενοι, πρεσβύτεροι. They appear to have been the counsellors of the head or ruler of the synagogue, and were chosen from among the most powerful and learned of the people, and are hence called ἀρχισυναγωγοι. Acts xiii. 15. The council of elders not only took a part in the management of the internal concerns of the synagogue, but also punished transgressors of the public laws, either by turning them out of the synagogue, or decreeing the punishment of thirty-nine stripes. John xii. 42; xvi. 2: 2 Cor. xi. 24. 3. "The collectors of alms," גבאי צדקה, diákonoi, "deacons." Although every thing which is said of them by the Jews was not true concerning them in the time of the apostles, there can be no doubt that there were such officers in the synagogues at that time. Acts vi. 4. "The servants of the synagogue," ὑποπρέτης, Luke iv. 20, whose business it was to reach the book of the law to the person who was to read it, and to receive it back again, and to perform other services. The ceremonies which prevail in the synagogues at the present day in presenting the law were not observed in the time of our Saviour. 5. "The messenger or legate of the synagogue," שליח צבור. This was a person who was sent from synagogues abroad, to carry alms to Jerusalem. The name, messenger of the synagogue, was applied likewise to any person who was commissioned by a synagogue, and sent forth to propagate religious knowledge. A person likewise was denominated the messenger, or angel, ἄγγελος, τῆς ἀγγελίας ἐκκλησίας, etc., who was selected by the assembly to recite for them the prayers; the same that is called by the Jews of modern times the synagogue singer, or cantilator. Rev. ii. 1, 8, 12, 18; iii. 1, 7, 14.

The Jews anciently called those persons who, from their superior erudition, were capable of teaching in the synagogue, פרושים, "shepherds," or "pastors." They applied the same term, at least in more recent times, to the elders of the synagogue, and also to the collectors of alms, or deacons. The ground of the application of this term in such a way is as follows: the word פרום is, without doubt, derived from the Greek word πύρρος, "bread," or "a fragment of bread;" and, as it is used in the Targums, it corresponds to the Hebrew verb רצה, "to feed." It is easy to see, therefore, how the word פרום might be applied to persons who sustained offices in the synagogue, in the same way as רצה is applied to kings, etc.

We do not find mention made of public worship in the synagogues, except on the Sabbath. Matt. xii. 9: Mark i. 21; iii. 1; vi. 2: Luke iv. 16, 32, 33; vi. 6; xiii. 10: Acts xiii. 14; xv. 21; xvi. 13-25; xvii. 2; xviii. 4. What is said of St. Paul's hiring the school of one Tyrannus at Ephesus, and teaching in it daily, is a peculiar instance. Acts xix. 9, 10. Yet there can be no doubt that those Jews who were unable to go to Jerusalem attended worship on their festival days, as well as on the Sabbath, in their own synagogues. Individuals sometimes offered their private prayers in the synagogue. When an assembly was collected together for worship, the services began, after the customary greeting, with a doxology. A section was then read from the Mosaic law. Then followed, after the singing of a second doxology, the reading of a portion from the prophets. Acts xv. 31: Luke iv. 16. The person whose duty it was to perform the reading, placed upon his head, as is done at the present day, a covering called tallith, to which St. Paul alludes, 2 Cor. iii. 15. The sections which had been read in the Hebrew were rendered by an interpreter into the vernacular tongue, and the reader or some other man then addressed the people. Luke iv. 16: Acts xiii. 15. It was on such occasions as these that Jesus, and afterward the apostles, taught the gospel. The meeting, as far as the religious exercises were concerned, was ended with a prayer, to which the people responded Amen, when a collection was taken for the poor.

The customs which prevail at the present day, and which Vitranga has treated of, were not all of them practiced in ancient times. The readers, for instance, were not then, as they are at the present day, called upon to perform, but presented themselves voluntarily, Luke iv. 16; the persons also who addressed the people were not rabbins expressly appointed for that purpose, but were either invited from those present, or offered themselves. Acts xiii. 15: Luke iv. 17. The parts to be publicly read, likewise, do not appear to have been previously pointed out, although the book was selected by the ruler of the synagogue. Luke iv. 16. Furthermore, the forms of prayer that are used by the Jews at the present time do not appear to have been in existence in the time of Christ; unless this may perhaps have been the case in respect to the substance of some of them, especially the one called שמע קרי, concerning which the Talmudists, at a very early period, gave many precepts.

It was by ministering in synagogues that the apostles gathered the Churches. They retained also essentially the same mode of worship with that of the synagogues, excepting that the Lord's Supper was made an additional institution, agreeably to the example of Christ. Acts ii. 42; xx. 7-11: 1 Cor. xi. 16-34. They were at length excluded from the synagogue, and assembled at evening in the house of some Christian, which was lighted for the purpose with lamps. Acts xx. 7-11. The apostle, with the elders, when engaged in public worship, took a position where they would be most likely to be heard by all. The first service was merely a salutation or blessing, namely, "The Lord be with you," or, "Peace be with you." Then followed the doxologies and prelections, the same as in the synagogues. The apostle then addressed the people on the subject of religion, and urged upon them that purity of life which it required. Prayer succeeded, which was followed by the commemoration of the Saviour's death in the breaking and distribution of bread. The meeting was ended by taking a collection for the poor, especially those at Jerusalem. 2 Cor. ix. 1-15.

Those who held some office in the Church were the regularly qualified instructors in these religious meetings; and yet laymen had liberty to address their brethren on these occasions the same as in the synagogues; also to sing hymns, and to pray; which, in truth, many of them did, especially those who were supernaturally gifted, not excepting the women. Those females who were not under a supernatural influence were forbidden by the Apostle Paul to make an address on such occasions, or to propose questions; and it was enjoined on those who did speak, not to lay aside their veils. 1 Cor. xi. 5; xiv. 34-40. The reader and the speaker stood; the others sat; all arose in the time of prayer. Whatever was stated in a foreign tongue was immediately rendered by an interpreter into the speech in common use. This was so necessary, that Paul enjoined silence on a person who was even endowed with supernatural gifts, provided an interpreter was not at hand. 1 Cor. xiv. 1-38. It was the practice among the Greek Christians to uncover their heads when attending Divine service, 1 Cor. xi. 11-16; but in the east, the ancient custom of worshipping with the head covered was retained. Indeed, it is the practice among the oriental Christians to the present day, not to uncover their heads in their religious meetings, except when they receive the eucharist.

It is affirmed that in the city of Jerusalem alone there were no less than four hundred and sixty or four hundred and eighty synagogues. Every trading company had one of its own, and even strangers built some for those of their own nation. Hence we find synagogues of the Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians, and Asiatics, appointed for such as came up to Jerusalem from those countries. Acts vi. 9.

[SYNCELLUS. An officer who lived with the bishop to observe his conduct. The bishop himself is sometimes so styled.]

[SYNCRETISTS. This name comes from συνκρητίζω, to join together, and is applied particularly to the followers of George Calixtus, because of their efforts to promote the union of Christians. See Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, Cent. xvii., and article CALIXTINES.]

[SYNDIC. An officer known as early as the fourth or fifth century, whose duty was to defend the rights of the Church, and to exercise a general supervision over its secular affairs.]

[SYNERGISTS. This word, derived from συνεργέω, to work together, designates those Lutherans who held, with Melancthon and Strigelius, that there must be a coöperation of Divine and human agency in man's salvation. They were virulently opposed by Flacius.]

SYNODS, though actually synonymous with COUNCILS, are in common historical parlance employed to designate minor ecclesiastical conventions. In virtue of this distinction, councils have usually claimed for themselves the ample epithet of ecumenical or general, while synods have long been known only by the humbler term of local or provincial. In the apostolic age four local assemblies were held, which some have called councils, and others synods. The first was convened for the election of a successor to Judas in the apostleship. Acts i. 26. At the second, seven deacons were chosen. Acts vi. 5. The third, like the two which preceded it, was held at Jerusalem, according to some authors, A. D. 47, but, according to others, A. D. 51; that is, at the latest, eighteen years after Christ's ascension. It originated in the attempt made to oblige the Gentile converts at Antioch to submit to the rite of circumcision. St. Paul and Barnabas opposed this attempt; and, after "no small dissension and disputation," it was determined that the question should be referred to the judgment of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem. Accordingly, some of the apostles and several of the "elders came together" to deliberate on the propriety of dispensing with the ceremonial law. The result of their deliberations was, that the Mosaic ordinances, being too rigorous, should be abrogated; and that their decision should be communicated to "the brethren which were of the Gentiles." Acts xv. 1-30. The fourth apostolic synod was convened in reference to the toleration of legal rites. Acts xxi. 18. With respect to all these, the fact is, that instead of being councils or synods in any proper sense, they were mere meetings of the Church at Jerusalem, and all of them ordinary meetings except the third, when they assembled upon the request of the deputies from Antioch who came to ask advice.

Dr. Neander, speaking of the origin, use, and abuse of synods, says: As a closer bond of union was early formed between the Churches of the same province, so also the Christian catholic spirit introduced the custom that in all pressing matters, controversies on doctrinal points, things relating to the ecclesiastical life, and very commonly in those relating to Church discipline, general deliberations should be held by deputies from these Churches. Such assemblies become familiar to us in the controversies about the time of celebrating Easter, and in the transactions about the Montanistic prophecies, in the last half of the second century. But these provincial synods appear, for the first time, as a constant and regular institution, fixed to definite times, about the end of the second or the beginning of the third century; and it was in this case a peculiarity of one country, where particular local causes may have introduced such an arrangement earlier than in other regions. This country was, in fact, exactly Greece, where, from the time of the Achaic league, the system of confederation had maintained itself; and as Christianity is able to connect itself with all the peculiarities of a people, provided they contain nothing immoral, and, entering into them, to take itself a peculiar form resembling them, so, also, it might easily happen that here the civil federal spirit which already existed worked upon the ecclesiastical catholic spirit, and gave it earlier than in other regions a tolerably good form, so that out of the representative assemblies of the civil communities, the Amphictyonic councils, were formed the representative assemblies of the ecclesiastical communities, that is, the provincial synods. As the Christians, in the consciousness that they are nothing, and can do nothing, without the Spirit from above, were accustomed to begin all important business with prayer, they prepared themselves here, also, for their general deliberations by common prayer, at the opening of these assemblies, to Him who has promised that he will enlighten and guide, by his Spirit, those who believe in him, if they will give themselves up to him wholly, and that he will be among them, where they are gathered together in his name. It appears that this regular institution met at first with opposition as an innovation, so that Tertullian felt himself called upon to stand up in its defence. Nevertheless, the ruling spirit of the Church decided for this institution; and, down to the middle of the third century, the annual provincial synods appear to have been generally in the Church, as we may conclude, because we find them prevalent, at the same time, in parts of the Church as far distant from each other as North Africa and Cappadocia.

These provincial synods might certainly become very useful for the Churches; and, in many respects, they did become so. By means of a general deliberation, the views of individuals might mutually be enlarged and corrected; wants, abuses, and necessary reforms, might thus more easily be mutually communicated, and be deliberated on in many different points of view; and the experience of every individual, by being communicated, might be made useful to all. Certainly, men had every right to trust that Christ would be among them, according to his promise, and would lead those who were assembled in his name by his Spirit. Certainly it was neither enthusiasm nor hierarchical presumption, if the deputies, collected together to consult upon the affairs of their Churches, and the pastors of these Churches, hoped that a higher Spirit than that of man, by his illumination, would show them what they could never find by their own reason, whose insufficiency they felt deeply, if it were left to itself. It would far rather have been a proud self-confidence, had they been so little acquainted with the shallowness of their own heart, the poverty of human reason, and the self-deceits of human wisdom, as to expect that without the influence of that higher Spirit of holiness and truth they could provide sufficiently for the advantage of their Churches. But this confidence, in itself just and salutary, took a false and destructive turn, when it was not constantly accompanied by the spirit of humility and self-watchfulness, with fear and trembling; when men were not constantly mindful of the important condition under which alone man could hope to share in the fulfilment of that promise, in that Divine illumination and guidance—the condition, that they were really assembled in the name of Christ, in lively faith in him, and honest devotion to him, and prepared to sacrifice their own wills; and when the people gave themselves up to the fancy that such an assembly, whatever might be the hearts of those who were assembled, had unalienable claims to the illumination of the Holy Spirit; for then, in the confusion and the intermixture of human and Divine, men were abandoned to every kind of self-delusion; and the formula, "Spiritu Sancto suggerente," "By the suggestion of the Holy Spirit," might become a pretence and sanction for all the suggestions of man's own will. And further, the provincial synods would necessarily become prejudicial to the progress of the Churches, if, instead of providing for the advantage of the Churches according to the changing wants of each period, they wished to lay down unchanging laws in changeable things. Evil was it at last, that the participation of the Churches was entirely excluded from these synods, that at length the bishops alone decided every thing in them, and that their power, by means of their connection with each other in these synods, was constantly on the increase. As the provincial synods were also accustomed to communicate their resolutions to distant bishops in weighty matters of general concernment, they were serviceable, at the same time, toward setting distant parts of the Church in connection with each other, and maintaining that connection.

In the second century after the birth of Christ, eight local synods were held on Church affairs, about which little information is now extant, except that they related to the heresy of Montanus, the rebaptizing of heretics, and the time for celebrating the festival of Easter. In the third century eighteen synods were held; the principal of which were, that of Alexandria, against Origen; that of Africa, against the schismatic Novatus; that of Antioch, against the heresy of Sabellius, and another in the same city against Paul of Samosata; that of Carthage, against such persons as fell away in time of persecution; and that of Rome, against Novatian and other schismatics. Prior to the assembling of the first general council at Nice, A. D. 325, three synods were held at Sinuessa, Cirrha, and Alexandria, the subjects discussed in which are unworthy of notice. Others were held, the discussions in which are so far interesting as they show how desirous the Ante-Nicene fathers were to regulate the doctrine and practice of the Church according to the apostolic model. The fourth was that of Elvira, which rejected by its thirty-sixth canon any use whatever even of pictures. "We would not," say they, "have pictures placed in churches, that the object of our worship and adoration should not be painted on their walls." The synod at Carthage not having brought the rival pretensions of Cæcilian and Majorinus to the episcopate of that city to a favorable issue, the Emperor Constantine appointed a commission (there being so few bishops present, it could not deserve any other title) to sit, first at Rome, and afterward at Arles, for the purpose of rehearing the matter. At Arles it was decreed that Easter should be celebrated on the same Sunday throughout the world; and that heretics, who had been baptized in the name of the Trinity, should not be rebaptized. The synods of Ancyra and Neo-Cæsarea followed. The tenth canon, decreed by the latter, shows the sense of the fathers on the subject of celibacy; namely, "If deacons declare at the time of their ordination that they would marry, they should not be deprived of their function if they did marry." Rigid decrees were passed generally against such of the clergy as ate meats which had been sacrificed to idols. After the forementioned synods, two were convened at Alexandria, A. D. 322, against Arius. But their acts merge in the subsequent proceedings of the Church. From the termination of the Council of Nice to the next ecumenical council, A. D. 381, no fewer than forty-three synods, eastern and western, were convened. The professed object of these meetings was the tranquillity of the Church; yet, from the unhappy divisions which prevailed in these assemblies, their deliberations were conducted with much of the violence of party feeling; and, according as the one party or the other prevailed, they severally hurled spiritual thunderbolts against their doctrinal rivals, as if against the enemies of God himself. Of the Synod of Sardica a separate and more particular account will be subsequently given, because on the authority of that unimportant assembly the Church of Rome grounds the right of appeal to itself before any other Church. In the whole, no fewer than eighty-one synods were assembled throughout the universal Church in this century. The principal subjects which engaged their attention related to Arianism, which was generally rejected by the western Church; but experienced various vicissitudes in the east, according to the view taken of it by the reigning power. Unfortunately for the peace of the Church, this heresy gave birth to numerous others. Marcellus, Photinus, Macedonius, and Priscillian, were severally betrayed by their violence into systems no less revolting to reason and common sense than the Arian impieties. Of sixty synods which were convened to regulate the affairs of the Church between the second and third general councils, A. D. 381-431, more than half of that number were assembled in Africa: no inconsiderable proof of the vigilance exercised by the local bishops over the interests of that portion of the Church universal committed to their care. In the latter part of the fifth century many synods were held, some eastern and others western, but none of them possessed peculiar interest. In the commencement of this century, Zosimus, Bishop of Rome, absolved the heresiarchs, Pelagius and Cælestius, and by this act confirmed their errors. On the latter appealing to him for support, Zosimus sent the Sardinian canon to a council held at the time in Carthage, as if that canon had been decreed by the Council of Nice; because it allowed the right of appeal to the see of Rome. The African council rejected it with disdain, having found, on reference to the eastern patriarchs, that no such canons belonged to the Nicene council, or were ever before heard of. Thus was the reputed infallible head of an equally infallible Church detected in a gross act of imposition; so gross as to compel our good Bishop Jewel to call Zosimus "a forger and falsifier of councils." The same pope pronounced his unerring judgment in the dispute between the bishops of Arles and Vincennes; while Boniface, his successor, under the influence of the same inerrant principle and in the plenitude of the same apostolic power, reversed that judgment. In the year 498, Symmachus and Laurentius were elected to the pontificate on the same day by different parties; and while they maintained the validity of their respective elections, they reciprocally denounced each other. Where, then, did infallibility reside before Theodoric, King of the Goths, gave it a supposed habitation in the person of Symmachus? Theodoric, an Arian, and consequently a heretic in the eyes of the Romish Church, awarded the keys of St. Peter to Symmachus; a circumstance which must have vitiated the boasted apostolic succession in the bishops of Rome, and therefore have destroyed their title to infallibility! Cabals and intrigues for being elected to the popedom disgraced the commencement of the sixth century. Their prevention in future, however, was decreed; and certain rules, having in view the peace and order of the western Church, were laid down by two synods convened at Rome about the same time. From this period to the middle of the century, upward of twenty local meetings of the clergy were held in different parts of Europe, fifteen in Asia, and only four in Africa. The directions for the married clergy, which occasionally present themselves to view in the proceedings of these synods, prove that celibacy was not at this period a general regulation; while communion in both kinds appears to have been an established usage. The synods which were held during the remainder of the sixth century were confined to France and Spain. They amount in number to twenty-six; and, like the rest of the minor class which preceded them, canons are interspersed among their acts which have in view the security of Church property, and the rights, privileges, and powers of the different ranks of the clergy. The remaining canons relate to discipline, with the exception of the few which were at different times ordained for the suppression of heretical opinions, for the regulation of both the married and celibate clergy, and of the fees to which they should be entitled on the performance of certain duties. In none of them is to be found the least authority for the distinguishing tenets of the modern Church of Rome; so that, to the very close of the sixth century, she may be considered as being orthodox, pure, and uncorrupt. Whatever deference she might claim as an elder branch of the Church of Christ, she raised no pretensions to a lordly preëminence over the rights and privileges of other Churches. Her jurisdiction was circumscribed within her own diocesan boundaries; and beyond them, none was demanded. After the commencement of the seventh century, however, a complete change took place in this respect, so that if a comparison be instituted between the tenets which the Church of Rome held in the first ages, and those which she subsequently professed, the precise period at which the novelties commenced which now distinguish her from her former self might easily be ascertained. The order of St. Benedict, which served as a model for the other monastic fraternities that were subsequently instituted, was founded in the early part of this century.

As the history of synods after the sixth century dwindles down into a meagre narrative of the unjust encroachments and corrupt innovations of the Church of Rome, and of the ineffectual struggles of Christian Churches in various parts of Europe to resist his usurpation, we shall close this article with an account of the Popish Synod of Sardica, and of the Protestant Synod of Dort. After a long night of darkness, the glimmerings of a bright day were perceived at a distance, when, in the fourteenth century, our celebrated countryman, the immortal Wycliffe, appeared as the precursor of the reformation from Popery. The light increased during the succeeding century, when those brave witnesses for the truth, John Huss and Jerome of Prague, suffered martyrdom; and the sixteenth century was favoured with the full blaze of day when Luther and Melancthon were encouraged and supported in their benevolent and arduous undertaking, and succeeded in putting down the shadowy forms of superstition and idolatry. Soon was the greatest part of irradiated Europe called upon to rejoice in this light; and to some of the best patriots in those countries that slighted such an opportunity, their own culpable supineness or neglect has been a source of deep national regret from one generation to another.

THE SYNOD OF SARDICA was held A. D. 347. The Emperors Constans and Constantius, being anxious to restore that peace to the Church of which it was deprived by the continuance of Arius's heresy, agreed to convene an ecclesiastical assembly in Sardica, a city of Mæsia on the verge of their respective empires. About a hundred western and seventy eastern bishops attended; but altercation, and not debate, ensued. The smaller party, apprehensive for their personal safety, withdrew to a town in Thrace—a circumstance that disclosed the first symptoms of discord and schism between the Greek and Latin Churches. Before this period the right of appeal from all other Churches to the see of Rome had not been claimed; but from it we date the first aspirations of Roman pontiffs to lordly pre-eminence; and they bent their restless energies to establish a spiritual tyranny over all the nations of the earth. Ecclesiastics, excommunicated by the oriental or African Churches, fled to Rome for refuge, one after another; and as the bishop of that city afforded them his protection, gratified as he was at every occasion which made it necessary, they, in order to testify their gratitude, unwittingly compromised the rights of the clergy, when, to the extent of their individual sanction, they invested him with the appellative jurisdiction. Among the refugees at Rome was the celebrated Bishop of Alexandria. Athanasius, persecuted by the Arian party in the east, knelt as a suppliant on the threshold of the Vatican. Julius gladly espoused his cause, and declared him to have been illegally condemned—a declaration that seemed to come with authority, but which the eastern bishops opposed as a usurpation of undue power. They went so far as even to excommunicate Hosius, Gaudentius, Julius the Bishop of Rome, and others, on the alleged assumption of authority. They maintained the principle laid down in the canons, that the judgment passed on any individual, either by an eastern or western synod, ought to be confirmed by the other. And while they complained that the bishops of the west should disturb the whole Church on account of one or two troublesome fellows, they accused them of arrogantly attempting to establish a new law for the purpose of empowering themselves to reëxamine what had been already determined. Chrysostom, too, in his distress, implored, at a subsequent period, the interference of Innocent, the then occupant of the papal chair, with the emperor of the east, for the purpose of procuring a reversal of the sentence of deposition pronounced against him by an obscure synod in the suburbs of Chalcedon. But that father never once supposed that the Roman pontiff had any right to hear his cause. His appeal lay to the supreme tribunal of a free and general council, from a packed assembly which the Empress Eudoxia had been instrumental in calling together, in order to effect his ruin. As these two cases of Athanasius and Chrysostom are pleaded by Romish writers in support of the appellative authority with which they invest the Bishop of Rome, it is a matter of importance to examine the stability of this ground-work, on which is laid the immense structure of papal supremacy. Hosius, who presided in the Sardinian synod, as he did at every council where he happened to be present, is reported to have proposed that an appeal should be made to Rome out of respect to the chair of St. Peter, and not, as was ruled at the Council of Nice, to the bishops of the neighboring province, when any decision had been come to in a provincial synod. But what is the language of the proposition made by Hosius? "If it be a favorite object with you, let us honor the memory of Peter, so that a letter may be addressed to Julius, Bishop of Rome, by those who decided on the matter, that, if necessary, the judgment may be reviewed by the bishops in his neighborhood, and that he may appoint some to hear the cause." Here neither canon nor Scripture is referred to, while it is left optional with the assembly whether deference was or was not to be paid to Julius, who is simply styled συνηγόματος, "a fellow-bishop." The fourth canon of this synod ordains, "that an archbishop, etc., deposed by a provincial synod, must not be expelled until the Bishop of Rome shall determine whether the cause shall be reëxamined;" and the fifth canon decrees, "that the Bishop of Rome, if he deem it proper, shall order a rehearing of the matter; that, if convenient, he shall send deputies for the purpose; if not, that he should leave the decision of the case to the synod itself." From the third and fourth canons it appears that a novelty in discipline is established, and made obligatory on the Churches of both empires, but only by a handful of bishops belonging to one of them; and from the fifth, that the Bishop of Rome, if he deemed a judgment erroneous, might convene a new council, and send deputies to it, for the purpose of reconsidering the matter. These canons, no doubt, were very flattering to the ambition of the Roman pontiff, and, accordingly, they are pleaded in behalf of his supremacy; but how preposterous is it to ascribe that to a human law which, it is asserted, belongs to him by the law of God! There are other canons regulating the intercourse between bishops and the imperial court; after such a manner, however, as to make the Bishop of Rome the judge of the propriety of the petitions which they intended to prefer. Notwithstanding all this, they can never be rescued from the imputation of being forgeries; for, 1. They were never received by either the eastern or African Church as general laws. At the sixth Council of Carthage, Austin strenuously denied the right of appeal to the Roman see, although a letter has been forged in his name, strenuously contending for it, which is now deposited among the pious frauds of the Vatican. It happened, also, in the early part of the fifth century, that Appiarus, who had been excommunicated by the African bishops, applied to Zosimus, Bishop of Rome. This pontiff forthwith sent them the Sardinian canon, which conferred on him the right of appeal. This they indignantly rejected, inasmuch as their predecessors, who attended the Council of Sardica, left no record of it; and because the eastern patriarchs, whom they consulted on the occasion, not only disclaimed all knowledge of any such canon being in existence, but furnished their brethren with an exact copy of the Nicene canons, among which the Sardican one was not to be found. 2. The Sardican canons were not inserted in the code of canons approved of by the Council of Chalcedon. 3. The council which passed them is not reckoned, even by the Church of Rome, as one of the eighteen general councils, whose authority it acknowledges; nor does Bellarmine himself say that it is one of those councils which his Church receives in part and rejects in part. 4. When the western bishops entreated the Emperor Theodosius to summon a council, A. D. 407, so far were they from making any allusion to the doctrine of an appeal to the Roman see, that they distinctly disclaimed the thought of such a prerogative, and only sought the fellowship of a common arbitration. 5. Lastly, if, as the historian Sozomen says, the Sardican synod wrote to Julius, Bishop of Rome, to apprise him of what they had done, and of their decrees being drawn up in the spirit of the Council of Nice, the purport of the letter was not so strong as that which they addressed to the Church of Alexandria, in which they pray it to give its suffrage to the determination of the council, and thus additional suspicions are created. From all these circumstances taken together, it is evident that no value is to be attached to the decrees of this obscure council; and that, although due respect was paid to St. Peter's chair, it was no acknowledgment of the superiority of its possessor as to ecclesiastical authority or jurisdiction.

THE SYNOD OF DORT. The Dutch Churches forsook the communion of the corrupt Church of Rome soon after the Church of England had cast off the papal yoke; and they were generously aided in their endeavors to recover their civil and religious liberties by our good Queen Elizabeth and her wise counsellors. The first Christian teachers among them were Lutherans; but, in process of time, the celebrity of Geneva as a place of public instruction for ministers of religion induced the majority of the candidates for the ministry to repair to that university; and, as might naturally be expected, they imported into the Low Countries the peculiar views of Calvin and Beza on the subject of predestination. It is justly observed by Le Vassor, "Some learned Hollanders had boldly defended this doctrine before Arminius became a minister at Amsterdam and a professor at Leyden, and likewise before Gomarus had risen up against him. Their writings are still extant, although it is true that certain ministers, who were too hasty, exerted themselves to bring those authors and their productions into disrepute; but the States of Holland uniformly checked this impetuous zeal. The professors of Leyden were allowed a perfect liberty of teaching conformably to the sentiments of Melancthon; and when Arminius was called to that university, his opinions were generally known; for he had declared them in the Church of Amsterdam, from the consistory of which he received very honorable testimonials. Gomarus, and many others of the same opinion, having entered into conversation with Arminius, made no scruple of acknowledging immediately that the difference of sentiments which existed between them did not at all concern the foundations of the Reformation. True it is, that Gomarus did not remain long on good terms with Arminius. Whether he had taken umbrage at the reputation of his new colleague, or the enemies of Arminius had found means to provoke the anger of Gomarus by some artful insinuation or other, he violently set his face against a man whom, some time before, he looked upon as orthodox." The struggles of the party of Arminius in Holland, after the death of that great man, to obtain a toleration for their opinions, are matters of history. The political circumstances of that country, and of Europe in general, were at that period very peculiar, and exercised great influence in the convening and conducting of that famous ecclesiastical assembly, the Synod of Dort; but in a sketch like this, they can only be briefly mentioned. Frederic, the Elector Palatine, married Elizabeth, the only daughter of our King James the First: he was nephew to Maurice the Prince of Orange; and he sent his Heidelberg divines to the synod to assist his uncle in the condemnation of the Remonstrant party, as the Arminians were generally called, and to gratify his polemical father-in-law in the overthrow of the heretical Vorstius. In return, he naturally expected both of his relations to aid him in his grand enterprise of seizing on the crown of Bohemia, in which, soon after the banishment of the Remonstrants, he completely succeeded, though he subsequently lost that crown and all his hereditary possessions, and embroiled nearly the whole of Protestant Europe in the famous thirty years' war.

The Remonstrants, according to Nichols, in the ample notes to his translation of the "Works of Arminius," had long wished to have their "Five Points" of doctrine brought for adjudication either before a provincial synod, to prepare matters for a national one; or to have them brought at once before a general council of Protestant divines. But the Calvinists would listen to neither of these equitable proposals. If a provincial synod were convened, especially in that province (Holland) which most needed such a remedy, these men well knew, from trial, how difficult it would be to combat and refute the strong and popular arguments of the Remonstrants, when both parties were placed nearly on an equality in the same assembly; and if a general council of Protestants were summoned together, they were certain that the principles of Arminius would, without demur, be recognized as integral parts of Scripture verity, and consequently entitled not only to toleration, (which was all that the Remonstrants had desired,) but to the especial patronage of the civil authorities. The latter result was anticipated, from the immense preponderance which the Lutheran divines, from all the small states of Germany, and from other parts of the north of Europe, would have had in such a council. Numerous state papers on this subject were written by the public functionaries of the different provinces in the year 1617;

among which, those of the composition of the learned Grotius, who conducted the arguments in favor of a general council, are very conspicuous for the superior ability which they display. A national synod was therefore the sole remedy which the wisdom, or rather the worldly prudence, of the Calvinists could discover for removing the maladies under which the Churches of Holland were at that time laboring. In showing cause for their preference, they were placed in an awkward dilemma; for they perceived that the strongest reasons to be adduced for the adoption of this measure would extend too far, and might, in the hands of their able antagonists, be made to apply with greater cogency to the convening of a general council.

The designs which Prince Maurice had long cherished against the ancient liberties and internal jurisdiction of the states, (each of which possessed by the act of union the complete management of its own affairs,) were then in a course of execution. By the forcible and illegal removal of the old burgomasters and governors, and the appointment of new ones; by the preponderance which these newly elected individuals gave to their own party in their election of persons to fill the higher offices of state in the various towns which had been ill-affected toward Calvinism and arbitrary power; and by the untrue and scandalous reports which were invented and industriously propagated respecting the alleged secret intentions of Barneveldt and the Arminians to deliver up their country to the Spaniards; the prince was enabled to succeed in his ambitious enterprises. To the party, therefore, that had forwarded his views he willingly gave all the weight of his influence, and that of the States-General, the majority of whom, in virtue of the late unlawful changes effected in the provinces, were favorable, not only to Calvinism, but to any measure which the prince might think fit to propose. It was in allusion to the revolution, thus craftily completed, that Bogerman, as president of the Synod of Dort, told Episcopius, in a sarcastic style, as Hales tells us, "You may remember what you told the foreign divines in your letter to them, that there had of late been a great metamorphosis in the state: you are no longer judges and men in power, but persons under citation." In such a state of affairs, an ordinance of government was easily obtained for convening a national synod, which was to consist of native divines appointed by the different classes and presbyteries, of civil deputies chosen out of each province by the states, and of foreign divines deputed by such Churches as had adopted both the platform and the doctrine of Geneva. The temper and intolerant conduct of the various ecclesiastical meetings with whom rested the inland appointments, had been but too apparent; and time had not mollified their intolerant principles; for, under the new order of things, and with the sanction of the fresh race of magistrates, they were emboldened to effect a schism in many of the chief towns, and forcibly to exclude the Arminian ministers from the churches which they occupied. In other towns, in which these bold practices could not be attempted with any probability of success, they employed the ecclesiastical arms of the classes, provincial synods, and other packed vestry-meetings, the members of which (consisting generally of Calvinists) summoned before them all the chief Arminian pastors in the various districts, accused them of holding heterodox opinions on the subject of predestination, and suspended or expelled them from the ministry. This work of expulsion and suspension was carried on by the dominant party even during the time in which the fate of Arminianism was in a course of determination by the Synod of Dort: so that, had that far-famed and reverend assembly decided in favor of a toleration of the Arminian doctrines, the minor church-meetings had left few ministers of that persecuted denomination to profit from such a decision. The Calvinistic account of this summary and iniquitous process is thus given, in the preface to the Acts of the National Synod: "And since there were several pastors in that province, [Guelderland,] some of whom had been suspected of many other errors beside the Five Points of the Remonstrants, others of them had illegally intruded into the office of the ministry, while others were men of profligate habits; certain persons of this description being cited before the [provincial] synod [of Guelderland and Zutphen, held at Arnheim, in July, 1618,] were suspended from the ministry for some of the before-mentioned reasons, and by no means on account of the opinion contained in the Five Points of the Remonstrants, which was reserved for the cognizance of the national synod. The trial of the rest of these men being dismissed in the name of the synod, was committed to a deputation from their body, to whom the states added certain of their own delegates. When they had fully investigated the cases of these men in their classes, they suspended some of them from the ministry, and entirely removed others." In the very able memorial which the Remonstrants, on their arrival at the synod, presented to the foreign members, it is justly observed, respecting those who were accused of having taught, beside the Five Points, those doctrines which were contrary to the fundamentals of faith: "Such particular cases do not in any manner affect the common cause of the Remonstrants, but concern those alone who may be found guilty of them. Nor are we adverse to the issuing of ecclesiastical censures against such persons, provided they be lawfully put upon their trials, and fairly heard in defence of themselves against such charges." Because the members of these Calvinistic provincial synods could not be long absent from their respective congregations, such galloping commissions as these, endowed with ample powers, were appointed to traverse every province in which Arminianism had been planted; and they soon showed to the world the most compendious method of rooting out reputed heresies. Their track through the land resembled that of the angel of destruction: it was marked by anguish, mourning, and desolation. After this detail, established by the synodical documents themselves, few words will suffice to point out the purely Calvinistic constitution of the Synod of Dort. When very few Remonstrant ministers remained in the land, except such as were ejected from the Church or under suspension, it was no difficult matter to procure an assemblage of men that were of one heart respecting the main object that was then sought to be accomplished.

In the original order for holding the synod, and in the list appended to it, as they were both passed by the States-General, no mention was made of inviting any other Churches, except those of England, France, the Palatinate, Hesse, and Switzerland, and it was a matter postponed for further deliberation, whether any invitation should be transmitted to the Churches of Bremen, Brandenburg, Geneva, and Nassau. The clergy of the principality of Anhalt were not invited to the synod, because their opinions were understood to be similar to those of the Remonstrants, the ancient confession adopted by their Churches being decided on the subject of conditional predestination. The divines of Bremen were viewed as men inclined too much to moderate counsels, and on that account improper representatives in an assembly that intended to carry every proposition with the unanimity of force. The divines of Brandenburg were the last of those invited. Indeed, no invitation was transmitted to them till the state and temper of their Churches had been ascertained with tolerable accuracy; and when it was generally thought that the deputies from that electorate were tractable and would follow in the train of the Contra-Remonstrants, it was determined to summon them to the synod. It was for some time a matter of doubt with the leading men of Holland, whether they ought to invite the divines of Geneva, and Nassau, two of the greatest nurseries of Calvinism, to be present at the synod. The cause of this demur was to avoid the appearance of partiality, which they justly thought all the world would have imputed to them had they convened an assembly consisting only of Calvinistic doctors. To keep up this semblance of moderation, the synodical summons was not transmitted to those divines when they were sent to the Churches of other states and countries. But when Prince Maurice's schemes of secular aggrandizement and political power had succeeded beyond his utmost wishes, they no longer studied to "avoid the appearance of evil," but boldly summoned all those divines about whose presence at the synod they had formerly hesitated. This was a most notable and certain method of procuring a strict Calvinian uniformity in the members. On this topic, Hales, in his letters from Dort to the English ambassador at the Hague, says, "For a general confession of faith, at least so far as those Churches stretch who have delegates here in the synod, I think his project very possible, there being no point of faith in which they differ." Great interest was made at the court of France to procure the attendance of deputies from the Reformed Churches of that country; but the King of France prohibited the Protestant clergy within his dominions from becoming members of the synod, or assisting at its deliberations.

The letters of the States-General, inviting the foreign divines to the national synod, were issued on the 25th of June, 1618; and the members were summoned to meet together in the city of Dort, on the first day of November in the same year. The letters of invitation to the divines of the United Provinces were dated September 20th, and the Synod of Dort was formally opened November 18th. Whosoever casts his eye over the list of the foreign divines that composed this last of Protestant councils, will find scarcely one man who had not distinguished himself by his decided opposition to the doctrine of conditional predestination, and who was not consequently disqualified from acting the part of an impartial judge of the existing religious differences, or that of a peace-maker. This caused the famous Daniel Tilenus to observe, that "no persons were summoned to Dort who were not well known to be zealous promoters of Calvin's predestination. In former ages, men were accustomed, first to go to the councils, and then to declare their sentiments: just the reverse of this is the practice in our days; for no one could be admitted into the Synod of Dort unless he had previously manifested the bearing of his opinions."

It will be perceived from the preceding statement, by what kind of ecclesiastical management the Remonstrants had been excluded from having any deputies in the Synod of Dort. So completely had the Calvinistic plan of exclusion succeeded, that three of the members from Utrecht were the only Remonstrants in that synod. The reason of their being there at all was, because that province was almost equally divided between Remonstrant and Calvinist Churches, and it had been agreed that three of each denomination should be summoned. But so obnoxious were the persons as well as the doctrines of the Remonstrants to their adversaries, that they would not allow even those three individuals to have a place in the seat of judgment. In the twenty-fourth session, it was unanimously declared, that they could only be reputed as cited persons; however, as the Acts express it, "that this synod might not be exposed to calumnies, as if they wished to exclude them, it was allowed them to sit among the judges" on five conditions, the chief of which were, "that while the affairs of the Remonstrants were under discussion, they should not disturb the proceedings of the synod by unseasonable interruptions, and not acquaint their party with any thing done or said in the synod which concerned their cause." Two of them, after a day's deliberation, united themselves with their suffering brethren; and the third, who was a layman, had seen enough of the partial conduct of that venerable assembly to induce him to absent himself from their further deliberations. As the Remonstrants formed no part of the members convened, it was debated in the fourth session how they ought to be summoned. It was proposed and resolved that a letter should be composed and sent to the whole body, that they might depute three out of each province as deputies to the synod. The president Bogerman then inquired if all the Remonstrants were to be admitted; the president of the lay commissioners answered, that the ecclesiastical president and the secretaries should receive a private explanation from him respecting their numbers. In the interview which the two presidents and the secretaries had together, they concerted matters so well, that next day the preceding resolution for writing to the whole body was withdrawn for amendment; and it was finally agreed that it should be left to the determination of the lay commissioners, what persons, and how many, should be convened. These gentlemen selected thirteen of the Remonstrants, to each of whom they addressed a letter of citation, commanding them to appear before the synod, "within fourteen days after the receipt of it, without any tergiversation, excuse, or exception, that in it they might freely propose, explain, and defend the before-mentioned Five Points as far as they were able and should deem to be necessary." In the mean time the Remonstrants, without knowing the resolution of the synod, had deputed three of their body from Leyden to obtain leave for their appearance at the synod, in a competent number and under safe conduct to defend their cause. On making their request known to the lay commissioners, they were informed of the resolution which had passed the synod only the preceding day. To which they replied, that it was unreasonable to cite those to justify themselves who were both ready and willing to come of their own accord; and that if they persisted in proceeding with their plan of citation, they would by that act furnish just cause, not only to them, but to all good men, to entertain strange notions and suspicions of the synodical proceedings. Not being permitted to choose those men from their own body whom they deemed the best qualified to state and defend their cause, they accounted it an additional hardship, that their enemies should assume that unlawful authority to themselves. But neither at that time nor afterward, when they wished to add two of the most accomplished of the brethren to their number, were their representations of the least avail. On the sixth of December these valiant defenders of the truth arrived, and requested, by a deputation, to be allowed a few days to unpack their books, arrange their papers, etc. But they were commanded immediately to appear in a body before the synod, and to prefer their own request. They were introduced by their brethren of Utrecht, and ordered to sit down at a long table placed in the middle of the hall. Episcopius then, with the permission of the president, addressed an apostolic greeting to the synod; and, having repeated the request previously made, he said that the cited Remonstrants appeared there to defend their good and righteous cause before that venerable assembly, by reasons and arguments drawn from the word of God, or else to be confuted and better informed from the same word. In reference to the favor which they had asked, they left it to the discretion of the commissioners of the States-General, being ready on their parts, immediately and without delay, to engage in a conference, if that should be required. Then were they desired to withdraw into a chamber prepared for them adjoining the hall of the synod. After some time spent in deliberation, they were recalled, and informed by the president that they would be expected at the synod next morning at nine o'clock. He added, according to Hales, "that they came not to conference, neither did the synod profess themselves an adverse party against them. Conferences had been heretofore held to no purpose. They ought to have heeded the words of the letters by which they were cited. They were called, not to conference, but to propose their opinions with their reasons, and leave it with the synod to judge of them." Episcopius replied, that it was not necessary so nicely to criticise the word conference, and that they had come there with no other view than to treat about the doctrines which were controverted, according to the summons which they had received. The next day, December 7th, the Remonstrants were called in, when, after Episcopius had desired and obtained leave to speak, he uttered an oration, the delivery of which occupied nearly two hours, and which, on account of the noble sentiments contained in it, deserves to be recorded in letters of gold. The gracefulness, force, and energy with which it was spoken, made such an impression on the auditory as drew tears from several of them, and even from some of the states' deputies. This effect gave mighty umbrage to the choleric Bogerman, who, as president, according to Mr. Hales's account, "signified unto Episcopius, that, because there were in his speech many things considerable, he was therefore to deliver the copy of it. Episcopius replied, that he had none handsomely written: if the synod would have patience, he would cause a fair transcript to be drawn for them. But this excuse would not serve: fair or foul, deliver it up he must, and so he did." In the session, December 10, after the president had ceased to speak, he desired the Remonstrants to proceed with their explanation and defence of the Five Points. They requested leave to have a paper read by Episcopius. Bogerman would not consent to this; but the lay president ordered another of the Remonstrants, Bernard Dwinglo, to read it. This very convincing document was addressed to the synod, and consisted of two parts. It may be seen at full length in the Acts, and is in every respect worthy of the great men whose holy cause it defended. The first part declared that the Remonstrants did not own the members of the synod for lawful judges, because the great majority of them, with the exception of the foreign divines, were their professed enemies; and that most of the inland divines then assembled, as well as those whose representatives they were, had been guilty of the unhappy schism which was made in the Churches of Holland. The second part contained the twelve qualifications, of which the Remonstrants thought a well-constituted synod should consist. The observance of the stipulations proposed in it, they would gladly have obtained from the synod, averring that they were exceedingly equitable, and that the Protestants had offered similar conditions for the guidance of the Papists, and the Calvinists for the direction of the Lutherans. The production of such a mass of evidence from writers of the Calvinistic persuasion, in favor of a toleration and moderate measures, and against the principle of interested parties usurping the place of judges, gave dreadful offence to that powerful body in the synod, and especially when they were charged with being at once plaintiff, judge, and jury. No one can form an adequate conception of the scene which followed the reading of this document. Bogerman, the Remonstrants, the lay president, and the commissioners, were warm interlocutors during that session and the succeeding one, which was held in the afternoon of the same day. Bogerman labored hard to show that, by denying the competency and impartial constitution of the tribunal before which they were summoned, they in reality were guilty of disaffection to the higher powers, who had appointed and convened the synod; and that, by charging the majority of the members with being the authors of the schism, they had in effect accused the Prince of Orange and the States-General, because those great personages had frequented the separate meetings. In reference to the latter circumstances, which exceedingly galled him and the inland divines, he said, "The proper time has not yet arrived for discussing it. But when it shall have been proved to the synod what kind of doctrine is sanctioned by the Church, those who have departed from it, and who are consequently guilty of the schism, will appear in their true colors." Charles Nielius, one of the Walloon ministers, answered in behalf of the Remonstrants, that though they acknowledged the authority of the states, and held the synod in due estimation, yet it was as lawful for them to challenge this synod, as for several of the Christian fathers to challenge some of the ancient councils, and their ancestors that of Trent. The laws themselves allowed men for certain reasons to challenge even sworn judges. But it was never known that any law allowed parties to be judges. Nor was it equitable, that those who had previously separated from the Remonstrants should sit in the synod to try them, after they had by such separation prejudged their doctrine and entered into mutual engagements to procure its condemnation. Episcopius then said, "Mr. President, if you were in our places and we in yours, would you submit to our judgment?" Bogerman replied, "If it had so happened, we must have endured it; and since government has ordered matters in a different way, it becomes you to bear it with patience." Episcopius rejoined, "It is one thing to acknowledge a person for a judge, and it is another to bear with patience the sentence which he may impose. We also will endure it; but our consciences cannot be persuaded to acknowledge you for the judges of our doctrines, since you are our sworn adversaries, and have Churches totally separated from ours."

On the morning of the next day, the Remonstrants, being called in, were urged by the synod to present their objections in writing against the Confession and Catechism. Before they proceeded to do that, they craved permission to read another document: after some demur, leave was granted, when Dwinglo read a paper which commenced thus: "The celebrated Paræus, in his Irenicum, prudently observes, that he would advise no man to approach any council in which the same persons had to appear in the character of both adversaries and judges." The rest of the paper was occupied in wiping off the aspersions which had been cast upon them in the four preceding sessions, and particularly the foul charge of their want of respect for the constituted authorities of their country. They declared, that in case men of peaceable dispositions had been deputed to the synod, as the States-General had intended, and such men as had never been concerned in making or promoting these unhappy divisions, they would have had little reason to offer exceptions against such a synod. This document concluded with a protest. After the delivery of this protest, the synod invented various methods to vex the cited Remonstrants and to impede the prosecution of their cause. Among those methods one of the most artful was, to ask them questions singly, and not in a body, with an evident design to entrap them in their answers. They had with the greatest injustice chosen those Remonstrants whom they thought proper, to be cited as guilty persons at the bar of the synod, without the least regard to the useful or splendid qualifications of the individuals thus selected. Of the six prudent and accomplished men who had represented the Remonstrant party at the celebrated Hague Conference in 1611, only three were summoned to the present synod; and though those who appeared on this occasion were generally men of good natural talents and sound understandings, and well versed in the matters under discussion, yet they were not all endowed with the gift of rendering a ready and extempore reply in Latin to every question that might be suddenly asked; and if they had possessed such a gift in an eminent degree, it would still have been necessary that they should have had time for reflection, and for each to compare his own views and reasons with those of his brethren. This request, however, which cannot be viewed as a favor, but as an act of justice, was almost without exception refused. Having presented to the synod their opinions relative to the Five Points, and their remarks on the Catechism and Confession, the Remonstrants wished to enter on the "proposing, explanation, and defence of them, as far as they were able or should think necessary," according to the very terms of the letters by which they had been cited; but the synod, in opposition to the plain and obvious meaning which those expressions conveyed, decided that it was a privilege belonging to themselves alone to judge how far the Remonstrants might be permitted to enter into the explanation and defence of their doctrines. This was accounted an act of great injustice by the Remonstrants, who also alleged, that "they did not feel many scruples about the doctrine of election, but that it was reprobation in which the chief difficulty lay." They were very desirous, therefore, of having reprobation discussed in the first instance; but the Calvinists of those days wished to keep unconditional reprobation enshrined in the dark penetralia of their temples, only to be produced, as opportunity might serve, for their own private purposes, either to terrify the careless among their hearers, or to quicken the occasionally sluggish current of congregational benevolence. It was not to be expected, therefore, that the Calvinists of the synod would allow the Remonstrants to give reprobation that prominence in their discussions to which it was justly entitled. In one of the debates which these two questions produced, Bogerman again took advantage of the disingenuous trickery which we have just exposed, and asked Pynakker, one of the cited ministers, "Do you imagine the synod will suffer the Remonstrants to examine the doctrine of reprobation?" Pynakker replied, "Yes, I do: because, as this is the chief source of the troubles of the Church, it ought to be first discussed." Perceiving either that his meaning was not correctly understood, or that he had expressed it in an imperfect manner, Pynakker immediately explained himself by adding, that by first he meant chiefly, (both of which significations the Latin word conveys,) and by acknowledging that election ought to have the precedence of discussion. When relating this occurrence, Poppius remarks, "This, being received in a wrong sense, was imputed to all of us, as though we were unanimously of opinion that the discussion of the doctrine of reprobation ought to precede that of election. Upon this question the foreign divines and others were desired by the president to deliver their sentiments. However, the expression imputed to us was employed by none of us, much less by all. But this was their manner: if one of us, in the name of all, said any thing that proved advantageous to the rest, the president seemed much displeased at our unanimity: then we were told that we were cited singly and personally, and that we did not compose a society or corporation. But when any of us happened to employ a word that was capable of being wrested to our common injury and misconstrued, then what was said by one was certain to be imputed to all!" After gaining a favorable opportunity like this, Bogerman always hastily dismissed the cited persons; and on this occasion he dwelt largely, in their absence, on Pynakker's expression, and persuaded the foreign divines that the proposal of the Remonstrants, to treat of reprobation before election, was a sine quâ non, and that without it was granted to them they would not proceed. This alarmed all the Calvinistic brotherhood, who rose vi et armis, delivered seriatim their objections to such a bold proceeding, and thought, with the professor of Heidelberg, "that it was unreasonable for the Remonstrants to disturb the consciences of the elect on account of God's judgments against the reprobated, and to plead the cause of the latter, as though they had been hired to undertake the defence of those who had by the just judgment of God been rejected; and that for these reasons the synod neither could nor ought to grant the Remonstrant brethren any further liberty, unless the members designed to expose the orthodox doctrine of predestination to be openly ridiculed." Finding this great aversion in the synod to the precedence of reprobation, the Remonstrants proposed, since they were forbidden to explain or defend their sentiments viva voce, "to explain their doctrines in writing, beginning with the article of election, and proceeding to that of reprobation; to defend their doctrines, and to refute the contrary opinions of the Contra-Remonstrants, and of those whom they consider orthodox; but that, in case this explanation or defence seems to be defective, they would answer in writing the questions which the president might think proper to propose to them, or in oral communications by those of their body whom they might judge best qualified for that purpose. And that the liberty which they desired might not appear unlimited, they bound themselves to proceed in such a manner as should not savor in the least of an insolent licentiousness; and that their discussions might not be extended too far, the lay commissioners were empowered to curtail them at pleasure." But these very equitable terms, which were much worse than those which the unsophisticated and grammatical sense of the citatory letters held out to them, were rejected by the synod, at the instigation and by the management of the president, who, after having had recourse to his old trick of propounding questions to each of the cited persons, and after procuring against them three or four synodical censures, had them, at length, (Jan. 14th,) dismissed from the synod, with every mark of contumely and scorn which he could invent. Bogerman had previously busied himself in extracting the opinions of the Remonstrants from such writings of theirs as had been published long before, and in forming them into articles, to be separately discussed by the synod. This passing of judgment on the Remonstrants from the testimony of their own writings, was an employment which Deodatus and his colleague from Geneva had at one of the earliest sessions mentioned as very desirable, and in which they appeared eager to engage. Any one who attentively reads the Acts of the synod, and compares them with the private accounts both of Remonstrants and Contra-Remonstrants, will find that this had also been the intention of the president from the very commencement, and that all his shifting schemes and boisterous conduct were intended to irritate the Remonstrants, who possessed more patience than he had contemplated, and who were therefore to be removed from the synod by a greater exercise of art and with greater difficulty. But one of the greatest injuries of which the Remonstrants had to complain was, that the book from which their supposed opinions were chiefly collected was the production of a declared enemy, who wrote a highly colored account of a conference respecting the Five Points, in which he pretended that the Calvinists had obtained a complete victory. A Remonstrant author had also written an able statement of the same conference, and had claimed a triumph for his party. The latter would therefore have certainly been the most proper authority from which to extract the real opinions of his body.

But though dismissed from their further attendance on the synod, the Remonstrants were not permitted to depart from Dort; the states' commissioners having charged them not to quit the town, without their special permission. The president, in his speech dismissory, had said that they would receive an intimation when the synod had any further occasion for them. When a Remonstrant deputy, by leave of the acting burgomaster of Dort, who was one of the commissioners, had hastily gone to Utrecht, to visit one of his children that was expected soon to die, he was on his return called to an account for his conduct, and the former order repeated. In the course of their detention at Dort during eight months, they were as strictly watched as if they had been condemned malefactors. One of them, whose sister lay on her death-bed, and earnestly desired to see him, could not obtain permission to visit her while she lived; and after her decease he was not allowed to attend her funeral. Another, whose wife was near the time of her accouchement, wished, like a good family man, to be at home for a few days at that critical period; but his request was refused. When the uncle of another of them was at the point of death, he longed for the presence of his nephew, to receive his dying commands, and to benefit him by his counsels and prayers; but the wishes of the good old man could not be gratified. After his death, the nephew was not allowed to look after the pressing concerns of his orphan cousins, although his uncle had appointed him their legal guardian. None of these favors, though reasonable and asked with much humility, could be obtained from the high bigots, in whose hands, at that time, was vested the personal liberty of the persecuted and cited Remonstrants. Toward the close of February, the magistrates of different towns deposed from the ministry three of the cited Remonstrant ministers who were present at the synod, and sent regular notices to their families, speedily to quit the parsonage-houses which they severally occupied. These three good men, being heartily tired of the strict durance in which they had been held since their arrival at Dort, represented to the states' commissioners that, as they were not now in the ministry, they could no longer be considered amenable to the jurisdiction of the synod: this was the very argument of the commissioners, when, at the commencement of the synod, the Remonstrants had wished to have associated with them the two recently deposed ministers, Grevinchovius and Goulart. Though, for very obvious reasons, at that early stage of the business, they would permit no Remonstrants to appear among the cited, "except such as were actually in the exercise of the ministry," yet they would not listen to the same argument when it militated against their favorite purposes; and the three ministers were commanded to remain at Dort with their brethren. One of the three, however, whose wife, then far advanced in pregnancy, had been ordered to leave her house within eight days, ventured to return to Horn, and to assist her to remove from their former dwelling. But, on his arrival, he found her already removed to another house; and his return to Dort was speedily required by the higher powers. To expedite his departure, two or three of the Calvinist magistrates employed their official authority in a manner the most reprehensible: they placed him, like a criminal, in the town wagon openly before his own door, though he had provided a carriage for himself on the outside of the town, to which he wished to have retired privately and without noise. A tumult ensued between the populace who were attached to their good pastor, and the soldiers whom the magistrates had placed before his house two hours before his departure. On his return to Dort, he was severely examined before the commissioners respecting the unhappy commotion; but being convinced that he had not been at all to blame in that affair, they passed it over in silence. At different times the Remonstrants wished to depute a few of their small body to the Hague, to make a proper representation of the manner in which they were treated by the synod; but this indulgence was invariably refused. Their only resource then was, to write to their high-mightinesses an account of their proceedings, and to implore their interference and protection. But such an attempt, in that posture of their affairs, was unavailing; for their doom was already sealed. Soon after their appearance at Dort, the magistrates of that city issued a proclamation, commanding the inhabitants, all of whom were celebrated for their attachment to Calvin, to refrain from insulting any of the foreign or native professors, divines, or other persons that were called to appear at the synod, on pain of summary punishment to the offenders. This document was not required for the protection of the Calvinists; but the persecuted Remonstrants were such objects of hatred to the populace, as scarcely to be allowed to pass along the streets without being maltreated. This bad spirit was excited and encouraged by the violent sermons which were fulminated against them, from the different pulpits in the city. Whenever these good men were required to be in attendance, (and they were liable to be summoned from their lodgings at a few minutes' notice,) they were not permitted to enter the large hall in which the synodical sessions were held, but were ordered to wait the pleasure of that venerable body in an ante-chamber, the door of which was generally locked, and the passage leading to it guarded by two or three of the police, who hindered them from holding any communication with their friends, and kept them in as strict durance as if they had been convicted of some capital offence. At the formal conclusion of the principal business of the synod, May the 6th, when the further attendance of the foreign divines was declared to be no longer necessary, the Remonstrants were summoned from their lodgings, and waited upon the lay commissioners at six o'clock in the evening, when the resolution and censure of the synod were read to them in Latin by Heinsius, the secretary, in which they were accused of "having corrupted the true religion, dissolved the unity of the Church, given grievous cause of scandal, and shown themselves contumacious and disobedient: for these several reasons the synod prohibited them from the further exercise of their ministry, deprived them of their offices in the Church and university, and declared them incapable of performing any ecclesiastical function, till, by sincere repentance, they should have given the Church full satisfaction, and, being thus reconciled to her, should be readmitted into her communion." They were then required to wait at Dort till further orders from their high-mightinesses; and when they requested to have a copy of the synodical censure and sentence against them, they were as usual refused. On the 24th of May, the cited Remonstrants were summoned to appear before three new commissioners whom the States-General had deputed from their body, when each of them was called into the room, and separately interrogated; after which, he who had been last called in was ordered into another room, and prevented from holding any communication with those who had not been ushered into the presence of the commissioners. The proposal and questions addressed to each of them were, in substance, the following: "Since you have been deprived by the synod, the States-General have directed us to ask you the following questions: Whether you are, notwithstanding this decision, resolved to act as ministers? Or whether you will be content in future to lead quiet and peaceable lives in obedience to the government, as private burghers, without any place or office, abstaining from all ecclesiastical ministrations in any meeting of the people of your sect, from all manner of teaching and preaching, exhorting, reading, administering the sacraments, visiting the sick, writing letters, or transmitting papers? It is the intention of their high-mightinesses to allow to those who shall conform to these requisitions such a competency as may enable them to live comfortably either in or out of these United Provinces, as their own choice may determine." In addition to these things, Episcopius was required to promise, "not to write either letters or books to confirm the people in the sentiments of the Remonstrants, or to seduce them from the doctrine of the synod." All of them professed their willingness to obey their governors in all such matters as might be performed with a safe conscience, to live peaceably themselves, and to exhort all others to the same practice. They also expressed their readiness to refrain from the exercise of their ecclesiastical functions in the public churches; but none of them except Leo could reconcile it to their consciences to abstain from feeding, in smaller assemblies, the flock of Christ over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers. The majority of them added, "Not only those who abuse or squander away their talent will be punished, but those also who bury it in the earth, either through fear of trouble or hope of advantage. It is therefore our duty to place our lights on candlesticks, and not to hide or smother them under a bushel or an easy bed; and we hope your lordships will neither hinder us, nor be displeased with us for so doing." In a subsequent interview with the commissioners, the Remonstrants proved that their reasons for continuing the exercise of their ministry had formerly received the sanction of the States-General themselves; for at the treaty of Cologne, in 1579, their high-mightinesses had insisted, "that subjects who professed any religion different from that which was established, could not satisfy their consciences by foregoing its exercise." But, after several unavailing conferences together, the commissioners left them in a state of suspense and confinement about twenty days longer. During that time several reports were brought to them from various quarters, "that some great calamity was impending;" and they were seriously advised to avoid it by a timely flight. They were likewise informed of Barneveldt's execution, and of the perpetual imprisonment to which Grotius and Hogerbeets had been sentenced; and that several of their brethren in the ministry, who had lately attended a meeting at Rotterdam about their affairs in general, had been taken into custody, and brought to the Hague, for that offence. They thought, however, that all these reports were only intended to create an artificial alarm, and to induce them to attempt an escape; thus delivering their enemies from the hatred to which they would be exposed by their further rigorous proceedings. But their firmness on that occasion corresponded with all their previous conduct, and they refused to dishonor their good cause by flight, or any other act of cowardice. On the 3d of July, after having been summoned from Dort to the Hague, they appeared before the States-General; and when they had been called in singly before their lordships, some time was spent to induce each of them to sign the act of cessation from the ministry. But to these renewed solicitations they separately returned the same modest answer as that which they had delivered at Dort. After allowing them two days for further deliberation, their lordships, on the fifth of the same month, having heard a repetition of their refusal, passed a resolution to banish them "out of the United Provinces, and the jurisdiction thereof, without ever being allowed to return, till the said states be fully satisfied that they are ready to subscribe the said act of cessation, and till they have obtained special leave from their high-mightinesses for that purpose, on pain, in case of non-compliance, of being treated as disturbers of the public peace, for an example to others." Episcopius delivered a short speech, in which, among other matters, he reminded their high-mightinesses, "that they had been invited to a free synod, and had received frequent verbal promises of a safe conduct." To this speech they did not deign a reply, but ordered the Remonstrants to be conducted into another room, and to have the door locked and bolted, while the provost and his officers attended on the outside for purposes of intimidation. After being kept some time in this kind of imprisonment, they were at length permitted to depute to their high-mightinesses two of their body, who requested that they might have leave to adjust their domestic affairs, to collect what was owing to them, and to pay their debts, that their wives and children might not be rendered miserable, and turned naked into the streets. They offered to give unexceptionable security for their return at such a period and to such places as their lordships might require. While they were preferring this request, the Heer Muis often interrupted them, and at last sarcastically told them "not to be so greatly concerned about their families; for if they had received an extraordinary call from God to serve his Church, he would undoubtedly support them after an extraordinary manner." But the only favor which the Remonstrants could obtain was, the deferring of their departure till four o'clock the next morning, provided each of them would promise to retire to his lodgings without speaking to anybody, and to be ready at the appointed early hour next day. Each of them had fifty guilders allowed for his travelling expenses, and a copy of the sentence of the States-General. But it was between nine and ten o'clock the next day before the magistrates removed them

In nine wagons toward Walwick in Brabant, the place of banishment which they had desired, where they arrived after a journey of three days. The canons of Dort, as the grand test of Calvinism, were then carried triumphantly by the synodists throughout the land; and every clergyman, professor, and schoolmaster that refused to sign them was deprived of his benefice and compelled to lay aside his functions. Several of them, in addition to their deprivation, were also banished out of the country to various parts on the continent. So ended these proceedings of the Synod of Dort as to these suffering men; proceedings which would have disgraced the worst age of Popery!

While in a state of banishment, these excellent ministers of Christ Jesus provided for the spiritual wants of their destitute flocks; and, at the imminent hazard of life and liberty, discharged in person, as often as they found opportunity, the duties of the pastoral office. After the death of Prince Maurice, in 1631, they were permitted to return to their native country, and to resume the peaceable exercise of their ministry. But the immense literary labors in which they were compelled to engage during this troublous period have, by the admirably overruling acts of Divine Providence, been rendered most valuable blessings to the whole of Christendom. Such doctrines and principles were then brought under discussion, as served to enlighten every country in Europe on the grand subject of civil and religious liberty, the true nature of which has from that time been better understood, and its beneficial effects more generally appreciated and enjoyed.

We subjoin their opinions on the "Five Points" in dispute between them and the Contra-Remonstrants, translated from the Latin papers which they presented to the synod. It is, however, necessary for the reader to be apprised, that, in framing these doctrinal articles, which served them as texts or theses for some most valuable dissertations on various cognate subjects, they intended rather to expose the unguarded assertions and extravagant dogmas of their theological adversaries, than to exhibit a simple statement of their own sentiments.

I. On predestination. 1. God has not decreed to elect any one to eternal life or to reprobate any man from it, in an order prior to that by which he has decreed to create that man, without any insight into any antecedent obedience or disobedience, but according to his own good pleasure, to demonstrate the glory of his mercy and justice, or of his power or absolute dominion. 2. As the decree of God concerning both the salvation and the destruction of every man is not the decree of an end absolutely [intenti] fixed, it follows that neither are such means subordinated to that decree as through them both the elect and the reprobate may efficaciously and inevitably be brought to the destined end. 3. Wherefore, neither did God with this design in one man Adam create all men in an upright condition, nor did he ordain the fall, or even its permission, nor did he withdraw from Adam necessary and sufficient grace, nor does he now cause the gospel to be preached and men to be outwardly called, nor does he confer on them the gifts of the Holy Spirit,—[he has done none of these things with the design] that they should be means by which he might bring some of mankind to life everlasting, and leave others of them destitute of eternal life. Christ the Mediator is not only the executor of election, but also the foundation of the very decree of election itself. The reason [causa] why some men are efficaciously called, justified, persevered in faith, and are glorified, is not because they are absolutely elected to life eternal; nor is the reason why others are deserted and left in the fall, have not Christ bestowed upon them, or, further, why they are inefficaciously called, are hardened and damned, because these men are absolutely reprobated from eternal life. 4. God has not decreed, without the intervening of actual sins, to leave by far the greatest part of mankind in the fall, and excluded from all hope of salvation. 5. God has ordained that Christ shall be the propitiation for the sins of the whole world; and, in virtue of this decree, he has determined to justify and save those who believe in him, and to administer to men the means which are necessary and sufficient for faith, in such a manner as he knows to be befitting his wisdom and justice. But he has not in any wise determined, in virtue of an absolute decree, to give Christ as a Mediator for the elect only, and to endow them alone with faith through an effectual call, to justify them, to preserve them in the faith, and to glorify them. 6. Neither is any man by some absolute antecedent decree rejected from life eternal, nor from means sufficient to attain it: so that the merits of Christ, calling, and all the gifts of the Spirit, are capable of profiting all men for their salvation, and are in reality profitable to all men, unless by an abuse of these blessings they pervert them to their own destruction. But no man whatever is destined to unbelief, impiety, or the commission of sin, as the means and causes of his damnation. 7. The election of particular persons is [peremptoria] absolute, from consideration of their faith in Jesus Christ and their perseverance, but not without consideration of their faith and of their perseverance in true faith as a prerequisite condition in electing them. 8. Reprobation from eternal life is made according to the consideration of preceding unbelief and perseverance in unbelief, but not without consideration of preceding unbelief, or perseverance in unbelief. 9. All the children of believers are sanctified in Christ; so that not one of them perishes who departs out of this life prior to the use of reason. But some children of believers who depart out of this life in their infancy, and before they have in their own persons committed any sin, are on no account to be reckoned in the number of the reprobate: so that neither is the sacred laver of baptism, nor are the prayers of the Church, by any means capable of profiting them to salvation. 10. No children of believers who have been baptized in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and who live in the state of their infancy, are by an absolute decree numbered among the reprobate.

II. On the universality of the merit of Christ.

1. The price of redemption which Christ offered to his Father is in and of itself not only sufficient for the redemption of the whole human race, but it has also, through the decree, the will, and the grace of God the Father, been paid for all men and every man; and therefore no one is by an absolute and antecedent decree of God positively excluded from all participation in the fruits of the death of Christ. 2. Christ, by the merit of his death, has [hactenus] thus far reconciled God the Father to the whole of mankind, that he can and will, without injury to his justice and truth, enter into and establish a new covenant of grace with sinners and men obnoxious to damnation. 3. Though Christ has merited for all men and for every man reconciliation with God and forgiveness of sins, yet, according to [pactum] the tenor or terms of the new and gracious covenant, no man is in reality made a partaker of the benefits procured by the death of Christ in any other way than through faith; neither are the trespasses and offences of sinful men forgiven prior to their actually and truly believing in Christ. 4. Those only for whom Christ has died are obliged to believe that Christ has died for them. But those whom they call reprobates, and for whom Christ has not died, can neither be obliged so to believe, nor can they be justly condemned for the contrary unbelief; but if such persons were reprobates, they would be obliged to believe that Christ has not died for them.

III. and IV. On the operation of grace in the conversion of man. 1. Man has not saving faith from and of himself, nor has he it from the powers of his own free will; because in a state of sin he is able from and of himself to think, will, or do nothing that is good, nothing that is indeed saving good; of which description, in the first place, is saving faith. But it is necessary that, by God in Christ through his Holy Spirit, he should be regenerated and renewed in his understanding, affections, will, and in all his powers, that he may be capable of rightly understanding, meditating, willing, and performing such things as are savingly good. 2. We propound the grace of God to be the beginning, the progress, and the completion of every good thing; so that even the man who is born again is not able without this preceding and prevenient, this exciting and following, this accompanying and coöperating grace, to think, to will, or to perform any good, or to resist any temptations to evil: so that good works, and the good actions which any one is able to find out by thinking, are to be ascribed to the grace of God in Christ. 3. Yet we do not believe that all the zeal, care, study, and pains which are employed to obtain salvation, before faith and the Spirit of renovation, are vain and useless; much less do we believe that they are more hurtful to man than useful and profitable. But, on the contrary, we consider that to hear the word of God, to mourn on account of the commission of sin, and earnestly to seek and desire saving grace and the Spirit of renovation, (none of which is any man capable of doing without Divine grace,) are not only not hurtful and useless, but that they are rather most useful and exceedingly necessary for obtaining faith and the Spirit of renovation. 4. The will of man in a lapsed or fallen state, and before the call of God, has not the capability and liberty of willing any good that is of a saving nature; and therefore we deny that the liberty of willing as well what is a saving good as what is an evil is present to the human will in every state or condition. 5. Efficacious grace, by which any man is converted, is not irresistible; and though God so affects the will of man by his word and the inward operation of his Spirit, as to confer upon him a capability of believing; or supernatural power, and actually [faciat] causes man to believe; yet man is of himself capable to spurn and reject this grace and not believe, and therefore, also, to perish through his own culpability. 6. Although, according to the most free and unrestrained will of God, there is very great disparity or inequality of Divine grace, yet the Holy Spirit either bestows, or is ready to bestow, upon all and upon every one to whom the word of faith is preached, as much grace as is sufficient to promote [suis gradibus] in its gradations the conversion of men; and therefore grace sufficient for faith and conversion is conceded not only to those whom God is said to be willing to save according to his decree of absolute election, but likewise to those who are in reality not converted. 7. Man is able, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, to do more good than he actually does, and to omit more evil than he actually omits. Neither do we believe that God [simpliciter] absolutely wills that man should do no more good than that which he does, and to omit no more evil than that which he omits; nor do we believe it to have been determinately decreed from all eternity that each of such acts should be so done or omitted. 8. Whomsoever God calls he calls them seriously, that is, with a sincere and not with a dissembled intention and will of saving them. Neither do we subscribe to the opinion of those persons who assert that God outwardly calls certain men whom he does not will to call inwardly, that is, whom he is unwilling to be truly converted, even prior to their rejection of the grace of calling. 9. There is not in God a secret will of that kind which is so opposed to his will revealed in his word, that according to this same secret will he does not will the conversion and salvation of the greatest part of those whom by the word of his gospel, and by his revealed will, he seriously calls and invites to faith and salvation. 10. Neither [hic] on this point do we admit of a holy dissimulation, as it is the manner of some men to speak, or of a twofold person in the Deity. 11. It is not true, that through the force and efficacy of the secret will of God or of the Divine decree, not only are all good things necessarily done, but likewise all evil things; so that whosoever commit sin, they are not able, in respect to the Divine decree, to do otherwise than commit sin; and that God wills, decrees, and [procurat] is the manager of men's sins, and of their insane, foolish, and cruel actions, also of the sacrilegious blasphemy of his own name; that he moves the tongues of men to blaspheme, etc. 12. We also consider it to be a false and horrible dogma, that God by secret means impels men to the commission of those sins which he openly prohibits; that those who sin do not act in opposition to the true will of God and that which is properly so called; that what is unjust, that is, what is contrary to God's command, is agreeable to his will; nay, further, that it is a real and capital fault to do the will of God.

V. On the perseverance of true believers in faith.

1. The perseverance of believers in faith is not the effect of that absolute decree of God by which he is said to have elected or chosen particular persons circumscribed with no condition of their obedience. 2. God furnishes true believers with supernatural powers or strength of grace, as much as according to his infinite wisdom he judges to suffice for their perseverance, and for their overcoming the temptations of the devil, the flesh, and the world; and on the part of God stands nothing to hinder them from persevering. 3. It is possible for true believers to fall away from true faith, and to fall into sins of such a description as cannot consist with a true and justifying faith; nor is it only possible for them thus to fall, but such lapses not unfrequently occur. 4. True believers are capable by their own fault of falling into flagrant crimes and atrocious wickedness, to persevere and die in them, and therefore finally to fall away and to perish. 5. Yet though true believers sometimes fall into grievous sins, and such as destroy the conscience, we do not believe that they immediately fall away from all hope of repentance; but we acknowledge this to be an event not impossible to occur,—that God, according to the multitude of his mercies, may again call them by his grace to repentance; nay, we are of opinion that such a recalling has often occurred, although such fallen believers cannot be “most fully persuaded” about this matter that it will certainly and undoubtedly take place. 6. Therefore do we with our whole heart and soul reject the following dogmas, which are daily affirmed in various publications extensively circulated among the people: namely, (1.) “True believers cannot possibly sin with deliberate counsel and design, but only through ignorance and infirmity.” (2.) “It is impossible for true believers, through any sin of theirs, to fall away from the grace of God.” (3.) “A thousand sins, nay, all the sins of the whole world, are not capable of rendering election vain and void.” If to this be added, “Men of every description are bound to believe that they are elected to salvation, and therefore are incapable of falling from that election,” we leave men to think what a wide window such a dogma opens to carnal security. (4.) “No sins, however great and grievous they may be, are imputed to believers; nay, further, all sins, both present and future, are remitted to them.” (5.) “Though true believers fall into destructive heresies, into dreadful and most atrocious sins, such as adultery and murder, on account of which the Church, according to the institution of Christ, is compelled to testify that it cannot tolerate them in its outward communion, and that, unless such persons be converted, they will have no part in the kingdom of Christ; yet it is impossible for them totally and finally to fall away from faith.” 7. As a true believer is capable at the present time of being assured concerning the integrity of his faith and conscience, so he is able and ought to be at this time assured of his own salvation and of the saving good will of God toward him. On this point we highly disapprove of the opinion of the Papists. 8. A true believer, respecting the time to come, can and indeed ought to be assured that he is able, by means of watching, prayer, and other holy exercises, to persevere in the true faith; and that Divine grace will never fail to assist him in persevering. But we cannot see how it is possible for him to be assured that he will never afterward be deficient in his duty, but that he will persevere, in this school of Christian warfare, in the performance of acts of faith, piety, and charity, as becomes believers; neither do we consider it to be a matter of necessity that a believer should be assured of such perseverance.

Under the article PELAGIANS has been shown the line of distinction which the Remonstrants drew between their doctrines and those of Pelagius; and the following are the just distinctions, which they presented to the Synod of Dort, between Semi-Pelagianism and Arminianism: “But we must declare, likewise, what our judgment is respecting Semi-Pelagianism. The Massilians, after the time of Pelagius, partly corrected his error and partly retained it; on which account they received from Prosper the appellation of the relics or remains of Pelagius, and are commonly styled Semi-Pelagians. They allowed the existence of prevenient grace, but only that which precedes or goes before good works; not that also which precedes the commencement of faith and of a good will, by which they believed that man preceded God,—yet this not always, but only sometimes: On the contrary we say, that God precedes or goes before the beginning of faith and of a good will; and that it is of grace both that our will be excited to begin well, and likewise that, being thus prepared, it be led through to the grace of regeneration. The Semi-Pelagians asserted that man, through the previous dispositions which had been implanted in his nature, obtained grace as a reward; and, however they might sometimes decline the use of the term merit, they by no means excluded merit itself: But we deny that, through the endeavors of nature, man merits grace. The opinion of the Semi-Pelagians was, that, for the preservation of the grace of the Holy Spirit, we want nothing more than that which either by nature we may have, or that which we may once obtain in conjunction with grace: But we acknowledge that, in order to our perseverance in good, special grace is likewise required.

“Wherefore we are unjustly accused of Semi-Pelagianism by the Contra-Remonstrants, since we condemn in the Semi-Pelagians those things which the Church universal formerly condemned in them. Yet these are great signs of inconsistency and consequently of a false judgment, that while some among them fasten Pelagianism upon us and others Semi-Pelagianism, there are others who declare that we are nearly and almost Semi-Pelagians, all of them having chosen and employed these epithets only for purposes of odium. Our conclusion therefore is, that we derogate nothing from Divine grace, but acknowledge its supernatural and unmerited acts, and their absolute necessity for the work of conversion. But, on the other hand, we frankly confess that the indifferency or liberty of the will is not taken away by grace, but that it is perfected for the better; and that the will is not necessitated, or so determined toward good as not to be able to do the opposite.

"This was also the judgment of all antiquity and of the Church universal; and the orthodox accounted this way to be the safest, which lay between two precipices, the one that of the Manichees, the other that of the Pelagians. St. Jerome says, 'We thus preserve free will, that we do not deny to it the help which it requires in every thing which it performs.' Dialog. adversus Pelagium. And St. Augustine, who was at other times a most fierce defender of absolute election, judiciously observes, in his forty-sixth letter to Valentinus, 'If there be no grace of God, how does he save the world? And if there be no free will, how does he judge the world?' And, as St. Bernard says, in the commencement of his book On Grace and Free Will, 'Take away free will, and there will be nothing to be saved; take away grace, and there will then be nothing from which salvation can come.' We have had regard to both of them; lest, if we denied the existence of freedom in the will, we should encourage the sloth and listlessness of men; or if the existence of grace, we should give up the reins to pride and haughtiness.—From these quotations [and others which they give] it is evident that the opinion of the fathers was, that free will and grace so completely conspire together, that free will is perfected by grace, and not destroyed; the destruction of the will in this case being a calumny invented by the Pelagians, which was generally refuted by the patrons of grace."

For other particulars relating to general redemption, consult the articles ARMINIANISM, BAXTERIANISM, CALVINISM, CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and LUTHERANS.

[Besides general, national, and provincial synods, there are diocesan synods, in which the clergy of a diocese meet to carry out the decrees of the superior assemblies. No synod can be held in the Church of England without royal authority.—The Presbyterians call the courts next above presbyteries, synods: among some, these are the highest courts.—The Lutherans also have what they call general and particular synods.]

[SYNTYCHE. See EUODIAS.]

SYRACUSE, a famous city of Sicily, seated on the east side of the island. Acts xxviii. 12.

[Syracuse was founded by a colony from Corinth, B. C. 734. Plato, Simonides, Zeno, and Cicero resided here for some time. Hicetas here first propounded the true doctrine of the revolution of the earth. Theocritus and Moschus were born here, and so also was Archimedes, who lost his life at the capture of the city by the Romans, B. C. 212. It was partially destroyed by the Saracens in 878, and by an earthquake in 1693. Its population has been reduced from two hundred thousand to fourteen thousand. It now occupies only a part of the original site, the island of Ortygia, between the sea and the great harbor. Among the relics of the ancient city are the temple of Minerva, now the cathedral, the cata-combs, the latomia or prisons, the fountain of Arethusa, a part of the Hexapylon, a temple of Diana, a Roman amphitheatre, the palace of sixty beds, baths, walls, etc. The church of St. Marcan claims to be the oldest in Europe. The city contains a number of churches, a royal academy, college, library, museum, barracks, and the mediæval citadel of Maniaces. The harbor is fine, but the trade is confined to a few exports of wine, oil, salt, and fish.]

SYRIA, that part of Asia which, bathed by the Mediterranean on the west, had to the north Mount Taurus, to the east the Euphrates and a small portion of Arabia, and to the south Judea, or Palestine. The orientals called it Aram. The name, which has been transmitted to us by the Greeks, is a corruption or abridgment of Assyria, which was first adopted by the Ionians, who frequented these coasts after the Assyrians of Nineveh had reduced that country to be a province of their empire, about B. C. 750. By the appellation of Syria is ordinarily meant the kingdom of Syria, of which, since the reign of the Seleucidæ, Antioch has been the capital. The government of Syria was for a long time monarchical; but some of its towns, which formed several states, were republics. With regard to religion, the Syrians were idolaters. The central place of their worship was Hierapolis, in which was a magnificent temple, and near the temple a lake that was reputed sacred. In this temple was an oracle, the credit of which the priests used every method to support. The priests were distributed into various classes, and among them were those who were denominated Galli, and who voluntarily renounced the power of transmitting the succession in their own families. The Syrians had bloody sacrifices. Among the religious ceremonies of the Syrians, one was that any one who undertook a journey to Hierapolis began with shaving his head and eyebrows. He was not allowed to bathe, except in cold water, to drink any liquor, nor to lie on any but a hard bed, before the term of his pilgrimage was finished. When the pilgrims arrived, they were maintained at the public expense, and lodged with those who engaged to instruct them in the sacred rites and ceremonies. All the pilgrims were marked on the neck and wrists. The youth consecrated to the goddess the first-fruits of their beard and hair, which were preserved in the temple, in a vessel of gold or silver, on which was inscribed the name of the person who made the offering. The sight of a dead person rendered it unfit for any one to enter into the temple during the whole day. The dynasties of Syria may be distributed into two classes: those that are made known to us in the sacred writings, or in the works of Josephus, acknowledged by the orientals; and the Seleucidan kings, successors of Alexander, with whom we are acquainted by Greek authors. The monarchy of Syria continued two hundred and fifty-seven years.

[Syria has passed successively into the hands of Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, the Seleucidæ, Romans, and Mohammedans. It is now called Bar-esh-Sham, the left country, that is, of Yemen, to one facing the east. It was formerly divided into Syria Palestina, including Canaan and Phœnicia; Cœle-Syria, between the ridges of Lebanon; Upper Syria, or Syria proper. It is now divided into the pashalics of Aleppo, Damascus, Tripoli, and Acre. Its present boundaries are the Amanian mountains, the Euphrates and the desert, Arabia Petrea, and the Mediterranean, embracing an area of fifty thousand square miles, and a population of one million eight hundred and sixty-five thousand, mostly Mohammedans, but comprising three hundred and forty-five thousand Greeks, two hundred and sixty thousand Maronites and Papists, one hundred and seventy-five thousand Jews, forty-eight thousand Druses, seventeen thousand Metualis and Yezedis. The revenue is estimated at two millions of dollars. There are some manufactories of cotton, silk, glass, soap, etc., at Damascus, Aleppo, and other places. The language spoken is Arabic, except by the officers of government, who speak Turkish; the Syriac is dead. There are several Protestant mission stations at Jerusalem, Beyrout, and other parts of Syria, which promise usefulness, particularly those of the American Board. See ACCHO, CANAAN, DAMASCUS, HELBON, JUDEA, LEBANON.]

[SYRIAC VERSIONS. The Peschito, or Literal Version of the Bible in Syriac, is generally thought to have been made in the first or second century. It is very valuable. A revision of it was made in the tenth century, at Mount Sigari; hence it is called the Karkaphensian, or Mountain Version. The Philoxenian version of the New Testament was made by order of Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis, in the fifth and sixth centuries. The Estrangelo, or Syriac Version of Origen's Hexapla, was made in the seventh century. See "Bible in many Tongues," and Horne's "Introduction."]

[SYRIAN CHRISTIANS. See CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS.]

SYROPHENICIA, or PHENICIA PROPER, called Syro or Syrian Phenicia from being included in the kingdom of Syria. It implies that part of the coast of Canaan on the Mediterranean in which the cities of Tyre and Sidon were situated; and this same country, called Syrophenicia in the Acts, is in the Gospels called the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. The woman also called a Syrophenician in Mark vii. 26, is in Matt. xv. 22 called a Canaanitish woman, because that country was still inhabited by the descendants of Canaan, of whom Sidon was the eldest son.

[TAANACH. A town belonging to Manasseh within the boundaries of Issachar, about four miles south of Megiddo. Josh. xii. 21; xvii. 11; xxi. 25; Judges i. 27; v. 19; 1 Kings iv. 12. It is identified with Ta'anuk, which contains but a few families.]

[TABERAH. An Israelitish encampment, so called from the burning mentioned Numbers xi. 1-3.]

TABERNACLE, in Hebrew, מִדְּבָרָה, in Greek, σκηνή, a word which properly signifies a tent, but is particularly applied by the Hebrews to a kind of building in the form of a tent, set up by the express command of God, for the performance of religious worship, sacrifices, etc., during the journeyings of the Israelites in the wilderness; and after their settlement in the land of Canaan made use of for the same purpose, till the temple was built in Jerusalem. The tabernacle was covered with curtains and skins. It was divided into two parts, the one covered, and properly called the tabernacle, and the other open, called the court. The covered part was again divided into two parts, the one called holy, and the other called the holy of holies. The curtains which covered it were made of linen of several colors embroidered. There were ten curtains, twenty-eight cubits long, and four in breadth. Five curtains together made two coverings, which, being made fast together, enveloped all the tabernacle. Over the rest there were two other coverings, the one of goat's hair, and the other of sheep-skins. These veils or coverings were laid on a square frame of planks, resting on bases. There were forty-eight large planks, each a cubit and a half wide, and ten cubits high; twenty of them on each side, and six at one end to the westward; each plank was supported by two silver bases; they were let into one another, and held by bars running the length of the planks. The holy of holies was parted from the rest of the tabernacle by a curtain, made fast to four pillars standing ten cubits from the end. The whole length of the tabernacle was thirty-two cubits, that is, about fifty feet; and the breadth twelve cubits, or nineteen feet. The end was thirty cubits high; the upper curtain hung on the north and south sides eight cubits, and on the east and west four cubits. The court was a place a hundred cubits long, and fifty in breadth, enclosed by twenty columns, each of them twenty cubits high and ten in breadth, covered with silver, and standing on copper bases, five cubits distant from each other, between which there were curtains drawn, and fastened with hooks. At the east end was an entrance twenty cubits wide, covered with a curtain hanging loose. In the tabernacle was the ark of the covenant, the table of show-bread, the golden candlestick, and the altar of incense; and in the court opposite to the entrance of the tabernacle, or holy place, stood the altar of burnt-offerings, and the laver or basin for the use of the priests.

The tabernacle was finished on the first day of the first month of the second year after the departure out of Egypt, A. M. 2514. When it was set up, a dark cloud covered it by day, and a fiery cloud by night. Moses went into the tabernacle to consult the Lord. It was placed in the midst of the camp, and the Hebrews were ranged in order about it, according to their several tribes. When the cloud arose from off the tabernacle, they decamped: the priests carried those things which were most sacred, and the Levites all the several parts of the tabernacle. Part of the tribes went before, and the rest followed after, and the baggage of the tabernacle marched in the centre. The tabernacle was brought into the land of Canaan by Joshua, and set up at Gilgal. Here it rested till the land was conquered. Then it was removed to Shiloh, and afterward to Nob. Its next station was Gibeah, and here it continued till the ark was removed to the temple. [The gold and silver used in the construction of the tabernacle, according to the present value of those metals, has been computed at about a million of dollars.]

The word also means a frail dwelling, Job xi. 14; and is put for our bodies, 2 Cor. v. 1.

[The military church of Constantine is called a tabernacle by Eusebius and Socrates.—In the middle ages the word designated a part of the altar and the canopy.]

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF, a solemn festival of the Hebrews, observed after harvest, on the fifteenth day of the month Tisri. Lev. xxiii. 34–44. It was one of the three great solemnities wherein all the males of the Israelites were obliged to present themselves before the Lord; and it was instituted to commemorate the goodness of God, who protected them in the wilderness, and made them dwell in tents or booths after they came out of Egypt. (See FEASTS.) This feast continued eight days, of which the first and last days were the most solemn. Lev. xxiii. 34, etc. It was not allowed to do any labor on this feast, and particular sacrifices were offered, which, together with the other ceremonies used in celebrating this festival, were as follows: The first day of the feast they cut down branches of the handsomest trees, with their fruit, branches of palm trees, and such as were fullest of leaves, and boughs of the willow trees that grew upon the sides of brooks. Neh. viii. 16. These they brought together, and waved them toward the four quarters of the world, singing certain songs. These branches were also called hosanna, because when they carried them and waved them, they cried Hosanna, not unlike what the Jews did at our Saviour's entry into Jerusalem. Matt. xxi. 8, 9. On the eighth day they performed this ceremony oftener, and with greater solemnity, than upon the other days of the feast. They called this day hosanna rabba, or "the great hosanna." [In John vii. 37 it is called "the last day, that great day of the feast;" and the allusion in that passage is thought to be to the custom which obtained of bringing water in a golden pitcher from the pool of Siloam, through the water-gate, into the temple, mixing it with wine, and pouring it on the altar—in reference, some think, to Isa. xii. 3.]

[TABITHA]. The same in Syriac as Dorcas in Greek—both meaning a gazelle, or antelope. A famous disciple at Joppa. Acts ix. 36–42.]

TABLES OF THE LAW. Those that were given to Moses upon Mount Sinai were written by the finger of God, and contained the decalogue or ten commandments of the law, as they are rehearsed in Exodus xx. Many questions have been started about these tables; about their matter, their form, their number, him who wrote them, and what they contained. Some oriental authors make them amount to ten in number, others to seven; but the Hebrews reckon but two. Some suppose them to have been of wood, and others of precious stones. Moses observes, Exod. xxxii. 15, that these tables were written on both sides. Many think they were transparent, so that they might be read through; on one side toward the right, and on the other side toward the left. Others will have it, that the lawgiver only makes this observation, that the tables were written on both sides, because generally in writing tables they only wrote on one side. Others thus translate the Hebrew text: "They were written on the two parts that were contiguous to each other;" because, being shut upon one another, the two faces that were written upon touched one another, so that no writing was seen on the outside. Some think that the same ten commandments were written on each of the two tables; others, that the ten were divided, and only five on one table, and five on the other. The words which intimate that the tables were written by the finger of God, some understand simply and literally; others, of the ministry of an angel; and others explain them merely to signify an order of God to Moses to write them. The expression, however, in Scripture always signifies immediate Divine agency. See DECALOGUE.

TABOR, a mountain not far from Kadesh, in the tribe of Zebulun, and in the confines of Issachar and Naphtali. It has its name from its eminence, because it rises up in the midst of a wide champaign country, called the Valley of Jezreel, or the great plain. Maundrell tells us that the area at the top of this mountain is enclosed with trees, except to the south, from whence there is the most agreeable prospect in the world. Many have believed that our Lord's transfiguration took place on this mountain. This place is mentioned, 1 Sam. x. 3. It is minutely described by both Pococke and Maundrell. The road from Nazareth lies for two hours between low hills; it then opens into the plain of Esdraelon. At about two or three furlongs within the plain, and six miles from Nazareth, rises this singular mount, which is almost entirely insulated, its figure representing a half sphere. "It is," says Pococke, "one of the finest hills I ever beheld, being a rich soil that produces excellent herbage, and is most beautifully adorned with groves and clumps of trees. The ascent is so easy, that we rode up the north side by a winding road. Some authors mention it as nearly four miles high, others as about two: the former may be true as to the winding ascent up the hill. The top of it, about half a mile long, and near a quarter of a mile broad, is encompassed with a wall, which Josephus says was built in forty days: there was also a wall along the middle of it, which divided the south part, on which the city stood, from the north part, which is lower, and is called the meidan, or place, being probably used for exercises when there was a city here, which Josephus mentions by the name of Ataburion. Within the outer wall on the north side are several deep fosses, out of which, it is probable, the stones were dug to build the walls; and these fosses seem to have answered the end of cisterns to preserve the rain-water, and were also some defence to the city. There are likewise a great number of cisterns under ground for preserving the rain-water. To the south, where the ascent was most easy, there are fosses cut on the outside, to render the access to the walls more difficult. Some of the gates, also, of the old city remain, as Babel-kouah, 'the gate of the winds,' to the west; and Bab-el-kubbe, 'the arched gate,' a small one to the south. Antiochus, King of Syria, took the fortress on the top of this hill. Vespasian, also, got possession of it; and, after that, Josephus fortified it with strong walls. But what has made it more famous than any thing else, is the common opinion, from the time of St. Jerome, that the transfiguration of our Saviour was on this mountain." Van Egmont and Heyman give the following account: "This mountain, though somewhat rugged and difficult, we ascended on horseback, making several circuits round it, which took us about three quarters of an hour. It is one of the highest in the whole country, being thirty stadia, or about four English miles—a circumstance that rendered it more famous; and it is the most beautiful I ever saw with regard to verdure, being everywhere decorated with small oak trees, and the ground universally enamelled with a variety of plants and flowers, except on the south side, where it is not so fully covered with verdure. On this mountain are great numbers of red partridges, and some wild boars, and we were so fortunate as to see the Arabs hunting them. We left, but not without reluctance, this delightful place, and found at the bottom of it a mean village, called Deboura, or Tabour, a name said to be derived from the celebrated Deborah mentioned in Judges."

Pococke notices this village, which stands on a rising ground at the foot of Mount Tabor, westward; and the learned traveller thinks that it may be the same as the Daberath, or Daberah, mentioned in the book of Joshua, as on the borders of Zebulun and Issachar. "Any one," he adds, "who examines the fourth chapter of Judges, may see that this is probably the spot where Barak and Deborah met at Mount Tabor with their forces, and went to pursue Sisera; and on this account it might have its name from that great prophetess, who then judged and governed Israel; for Josephus relates, that Deborah and Barak gathered the army together at this mountain."

"From the top of Tabor," says Maundrell, "you have a prospect which, if nothing else, will reward the labor of ascending it. It is impossible for man's eyes to behold a higher gratification of this nature. On the north-west you discern at a distance the Mediterranean, and all around you have the spacious and beautiful plains of Esdraelon and Galilee. Turning a little southward, you have in view the high mountains of Gilboa, fatal to Saul and his sons. Due east you discover the Sea of Tiberias, distant about one day's journey. A few points to the north appears that which they call the Mount of Beatitudes. Not far from this little hill is the city Saphet: it stands upon a very eminent and conspicuous mountain, and is seen far and near." Beyond this is seen a much higher mountain, capped with snow, a part of the chain of Antilibanus. To the south-west is Carmel, and on the south the hills of Samaria.

[Robinson estimates the height of Tabor at a thousand feet above the plain: Schubert, thirteen hundred and ten Paris feet. It was on the border of Issachar and Zebulun, Josh. xix. 22: Judg. iv. It seems to have been distinguished for its beauty, Ps. lxxxix. 12: Jer. xli. 18; and for that reason may have been resorted to for idolatrous purposes, Hos. v. 1. A Levitical town was situated at it, or on it. 1 Chron. vi. 77. Tabor is not named in the New Testament. Its first identification with the Mount of Transfiguration appears in the works of Cyril of Jerusalem; but as there was a fortified city on it in the time of Christ, this opinion is scarcely tenable. The Transfiguration seems to have taken place on one of the mountains near Casarea Philippi. Matt. xvi.; xvii. Antoninus Martyr, in the sixth century, says there were three churches on Tabor, corresponding to Peter's "three tabernacles." Monasteries were afterward erected; but they were all laid in ruins by the Mohammedans, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.]

[TABORITES. In 1420 the Hussites were divided into Calixtines and Taborites, the latter being so styled from a mountain in Bohemia, which they called Tabor, where John Huss had held camp-meetings, and where they erected a fortified city. Provoked by the barbarities of the emperor and clergy, the Hussites destroyed the convents and churches, and put the priests to death. After repulsing the imperial armies in 1427 and 1431, the Council of Basel effected a compromise; but hostilities were renewed in 1434, when the Taborites gained a complete victory. They afterward revised their doctrinal and disciplinary platform, purged their churches of fanatical and immoral persons, and abandoned war as inconsistent with the spirit of the gospel. Mosheim, who charges all the acts of violence, etc., attributed to the Hussites upon the Taborites, says that after they were remodelled they joined the Lutherans. He identifies them with the Bohemian brethren, nicknamed PICARDS by their adversaries.]

[TABRET. A tambourine. See Music.]

TADMOR, a city built by Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 18, afterward called Palmyra, situated in a wilderness of Syria, upon the borders of Arabia Deserta, inclining toward the Euphrates. Josephus places it two days' journey from the Euphrates, and six days' journey from Babylon. He says there is no water anywhere else in the wilderness but in this place. At the present day there are to be seen vast ruins of this city. There was nothing more magnificent in the whole east. There are still found a great number of inscriptions, the most of which are Greek, and the other in the Palmyrenian character. Nothing relating to the Jews is seen in the Greek inscriptions, and the Palmyrenian inscriptions are entirely unknown, as well as the language and the character of that country. The city of Tadmor preserved this name to the time of the conquest by Alexander the Great: then it had the name of Palmyra given to it, which it preserved for several ages. About the middle of the third century it became famous, because Odenatus and Zenobia his queen made it the seat of their empire. When the Saracens became masters of the east, they restored its ancient name of Tadmor to it again, which it has always preserved since. It is surrounded by sandy deserts on all sides. It is not known when, nor by whom, it was reduced to the ruinous condition in which it is now found. It may be said to consist at present of a forest of Corinthian pillars, erect and fallen. So numerous are these, consisting of many thousands, that the spectator is at a loss to connect or arrange them in any order or symmetry, or to conceive what purpose or design they could have answered. "In the space covered by these ruins," says Volney, "we sometimes find a palace of which nothing remains but the court and walls; sometimes a temple whose peristyle is half thrown down; and now a portico, a gallery, or triumphal arch. Here stand groups of columns whose symmetry is destroyed by the fall of many of them; there we see them ranged in rows of such length that, similar to rows of trees, they deceive the sight, and assume the appearance of continued walls. If, from this striking scene, we cast our eyes upon the ground, another, almost as varied, presents itself. On all sides we behold nothing but subverted shafts, some whole, others shattered to pieces, or dislocated in their joints; and on which side soever we look, the earth is strewn with vast stones half buried, with broken entablatures, mutilated friezes, disfigured reliefs, effaced sculptures, violated tombs, and altars defiled by dust."

It is probable, says Mansford, that although Tadmor is said to have been built by Solomon, or, in other words, to have been erected by him into a city, it was a watering station between Syria and Mesopotamia before, with, perhaps, accommodations suited to the mode of travelling in those times, as we read of palm trees being found there, which are not trees that come by chance in these desert regions. The mere circumstance of wholesome water being afforded by any spot in such a country, was sufficient to give it importance, and to draw toward it the stream of communication, for whatever purpose. This was probably the condition of Tadmor long before it received its name and its honors from Solomon. But, after all, what motive could there be to induce a peaceable king, like Solomon, to undertake a work so distant, difficult, and dangerous? There is but one which at all accords with his character, or the history of the times—commercial enterprise. Solomon was at great pains to secure himself in the possession of the ports of Elath and Ezion-geber, on the Red Sea, and to establish a navy for his Indian commerce, or trade to Ophir—in all ages the great source of wealth. The riches of India thus brought into Judea, were from thence disseminated over those countries of the north and west at that time inhabited or known; while the same country, Judea, became, for a season, like Tyre, the point of return and exchange of the money and the commodities of those countries, the centre of communication between the east and the west.

[TAHAPANHES. A city of Egypt, on the Pelusiac arm of the Nile, called by the Greeks the Pelusian Daphnæ. Herodotus: Euterpe, 30, 107. It was the traditional death-place of Jeremiah. Jer. ii. 16; xliii. 7: Ezek. xxx. 18.]

TALENT, a measure of weight among the ancients, equivalent to sixty maneh, or one hundred and thirteen pounds ten ounces one penny-weight and ten grains. The value of a talent of silver was three hundred and forty-two pounds three shillings and nine-pence, and a talent of gold was equal to five thousand four hundred and seventy-five pounds sterling. In the writings of the evangelists, the term is employed to denote the various gifts or opportunities for usefulness which the Lord of heaven confers upon his servants, and for which he will call them to give in their account at the last day. Matt. xxv. 15: Luke xix. 12.

TALITHA-CUMI, the words that Jesus Christ made use of when he raised up the daughter of Jairus, the chief of the synagogue of Capernaum. They are not pure Hebrew, but Syriac, and signify, "My daughter, arise." Mark v. 41.

[TALMAL. King of Geshur, and father-in-law of David. 2 Sam. iii. 3; xiii. 37.]

TALMUD. See Jews.

[TAMAR. Daughter-in-law of Judah. It has been suggested that she may have considered the transaction between her and Judah in the light of a marriage. Among the Garrows of Asia, a widow marries her father-in-law, if there be no brother-in-law for her to marry. Tamar's son Pharez, by Judah, was an ancestor of Christ. Gen. xxxix.: Matt. i. 3. As Tamar means a palm tree, a symbol of gracefulness, it seems to have been a favorite name for a female. Absalom's sister—or, as some think, half-sister, the daughter of Maachah before David married her—and also his daughter, were so named. 2 Sam. xiii.; xiv. 27: 1 Chron. iii. 9.]

[TAMAR. A place in the south of Palestine. Ezek. xlvii. 19; xlviii. 28.]

[TAMMUZ. Ezek. viii. 14. This is supposed to be the Syrian god Adonis, whose worship was celebrated at the temple of Venus at Byblus. "The Syrians," says Lucian, "say that what the boar is reported to have done against Adonis was done in their country, in memory of which they beat themselves, lament, and celebrate frantic rites, and great wailings are appointed through the country; and after they have beaten themselves and lamented, they first perform funeral obsequies to Adonis as to one dead, and afterward, on the next or another day, they feign that he is alive, and ascended into the air." The celebration was attended with obscene rites. Some think Tammuz was considered an incarnation of the sun. Others, from the resemblance of Adonis to the Hebrew word for Lord, Adoni, and the peculiarity of some of the ceremonies, suggest that this idol was originally designed to represent Christ. See Parkhurst, sub voce. The river Adonis, which, according to the fable, "ran purple to the sea, suffused with blood of Thammuz, yearly wounded," (Paradise Lost, b. i.,) is made red by the soil over which it passes when at its flood. It rises in Lebanon, where Adonis is said to have been hunting when he was killed by the boar. The love of Venus for the beautiful youth, with her grief at his death, etc., is celebrated in fervid strains by Ovid, Shakspeare, and other poets.]

[TAPPUAH. A city near Hebron, supposed to be represented by an old village called Tefüh. It is called Beth-Tappuah, Josh. xv. 53: it seems to be the Tappuah of Josh. xii. 17: compare x. 36.—There was a Tappuah in the plain of Judah, Josh. xv. 34; and one on the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh, Josh. xvi. 8.]

TARE, Matt. xiii. 25-27, 29, 30, 36, 38, 40. It is not easy to determine what plant or weed is here intended, as the word zizania is neither mentioned in any other part of Scripture, nor in any ancient Greek writer. Some Greek and Latin fathers have made use of it, as have also Suidas and Phavorinus; but it is probable that they have all derived it from this text. As this gospel was first written in Syriac, it is probably a word belonging to that language. Buxtorf gives several interpretations, but at last concludes with submitting it to the decision of others. In a treatise in the Mishna, called "Kilayim," which treats expressly of different kinds of seeds, a bastard or degenerate wheat is mentioned by the name of זרע, which the very sound, in pronouncing, proves to be the same as the zizanian; and which may lead to the true derivation of the word, that is, from the Chaldee זר, "a kind" or "species" of grain, namely, whence the corrupt Hebrew or Syriac זרע, which in the ancient Syriac version answers to the Greek ζιζάνια. Matt. xiii. 25, etc. In Psalm cxliv. 13, the words זרע זרע are translated, "all manner of store;" but they properly signify "from species to species." Might not the Chaldee word זרע, and the Greek word ζιζάνιον, come from the Psalmist's זרע, which might have signified a "mixture" of grain of any kind, and be here used to point out the mixing bastard or degenerate wheat among the good seed-wheat? Mintert says, that "it is a kind of plant, not unlike corn or wheat, having at first the same sort of stalk, and the same viridity, but bringing forth no fruit, at least none good;" and he adds, from John Melchior, "ζιζάνιον does not signify every weed in general which grows among corn, but a particular seed, known in Caſaan, which was not unlike wheat, but, being put into the ground, degenerated, and assumed another nature and form." Parkhurst and Dr. Campbell render it "the darnel," "lolium temulentum." The same plant is called "zizana" by the Spaniards; as it appears to be called zuwan, by the Turks and Arabs. "It is well known to the people at Aleppo," says M. Forskal; "it grows among corn. If the seeds remain mixed with the meal, they occasion dizziness to those who eat of the bread. The reapers do not separate the plant; but after the threshing, they reject the seeds by means of a van or sieve." Other travellers mention, that in some parts of Syria the plant is drawn up by the hand in the time of harvest, along with the wheat, and is then gathered out, and bound up in separate bundles. In the parable of the tares, our Lord states the very same circumstances. They grew among the grain; they were not separated by the tillers, but suffered to grow up together till the harvest; they were then gathered from among the wheat with the hand, and bound up in bundles.

TARGUM. See JEWS.

TARSHISH, a country of this name, whither Solomon sent his fleets. 1 Kings x. 22: 2 Chron. ix. 21. There are a multitude of different opinions concerning this country. Josephus, and the Chaldee and Arabic paraphrasts, explain it of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia; the Septuagint, St. Jerome, and Theodoret, understand it of Carthage. The Arabian geographer will have it to be Tunis in Africa. Bochart makes it be Tartessus, an island in the Straits of Gades. By Tarshish,

M. Le Clerc understands Thassus, an island and city in the Ægean sea. Grotius thinks that the whole ocean was called Tarshish, because of the famous city of Tartessus, now mentioned. Sanctius believes the sea in general to be called Tarshish, and that the ships of Tarshish were those that are employed in voyages at sea, in opposition to the small vessels that are used only in most navigable rivers. The LXX. translate Tarshish sometimes by "the sea;" and the Scripture gives the names of ships of Tarshish to those that were fitted out at Ezion-geber, on the Red Sea, and which sailed upon the ocean, as well as to those that were fitted out at Joppa, and in the ports of the Mediterranean. Therefore, when we see ships fitted out upon the Red Sea, or at Ezion-geber, in order to go to Tarshish, we must conclude one of these two things, either that there were two countries called Tarshish, one upon the ocean, and another upon the Mediterranean, or that ships of Tarshish in general signifies nothing else but ships able to bear a long voyage; large merchant-ships, in opposition to the small craft intended for a home trade in navigable rivers.

TARSUS, the capital of Cilicia, and the native city of St. Paul. Acts ix. 11; xxi. 39. Some think it obtained the privileges of a Roman colony because of its firm adherence to Julius Cæsar; and this procured the inhabitants the favor of being acknowledged citizens of Rome, which St. Paul enjoyed by being born in it. Others maintain that Tarsus was only a free city, but not a Roman colony, in the time of St. Paul, and that his privilege as a Roman citizen was founded upon some other right, perhaps gained by his ancestors.

[Tarsus was situated twelve miles from the mouth of the Cydnus, which flowed through it. It is said to have been founded by Sardanapalus. The tributary kings of Cilicia, under the Persian sway, resided there. Strabo says, in all that relates to philosophy and general education, it was more illustrious than Athens and Alexandria. The stoic Antipater and the philosopher Athenodorus were born at Tarsus, and Julian the Apostate was buried there. Tersoos, as it is now called, is the chief town of that part of Karamania. The houses, which are low, were built out of the materials of the ancient city, many remains of which are still scattered around. The permanent population, composed of Turks, is estimated at seven thousand, though it is said to number thirty thousand in winter.]

[TARTAN. See SARGON.]

[TASCODRUGITÆ. Montanists who derived their name from two Phrygian words, which indicate their custom of putting the finger on the nose in time of prayer.]

[TATIANISTS. Followers of Tatian, A. D. 170. He published a "Discourse against the Gentiles," which is still extant. See ENCRATITES.]

[TATNAI. A Persian governor of "the province of Judea." Ezra v., vi.]

[TAVERNS, THE THREE. Acts xxviii. 15. A place on the Appian Way, thirty-three miles from Rome. Taberna, from trabs, means a wooden building, or shed. The Tres Tabernæ were most likely three victualling shops, which gave name to the village that sprang up around them. Cicero, writing to Atticus, alludes to this place: "Dated at the fourth hour from Appii Forum: I sent off another a little before, from the Three Taverns." Optatus speaks of Felix, of the Three Taverns, a bishop of the fourth century.]

TEARS. The prayer of David, "Put my tears into thy bottle," is unintelligible without an acquaintance with ancient customs. "This passage," says Burder, "seems to intimate that the custom of putting tears into the ampullæ, or urnal lachrymales, so well known among the Romans, was more anciently in use among the eastern nations, and particularly the Hebrews. These urns were of different materials, some of glass, some of earth; as may be seen in the work of Montfaucon, where also may be seen the various forms or shapes of them. These urns were placed on the sepulchres of the deceased, as a memorial of the distress and affection of their surviving relations and friends. It will be difficult to account for this expression of the Psalmist but upon this supposition. If this be allowed, the meaning will be, 'Let my distress, and the tears I shed in consequence of it, be ever before thee, excite thy kind remembrance of me, and plead with thee to grant the relief I stand in need of.'" [Psalm lvi. 8.]

[TEBETH. The tenth of the sacred and fourth of the civil year. Esther ii. 16.]

[TE DEUM. A sublime hymn, so called from its first words. Tradition credits it to Ambrose, and says it was, as Bishop Cosin words it, "divinely composed when S. Augustin was baptized by him, and sung by them both in profession of their faith, and honor of the Blessed Trinity." Bishop Stillingfleet says Nicetus, Bishop of Triers in Gaul, composed it, A. D. 535, for the Gallic Church. A fine prose version of it is found in the English Liturgy, and a poetic one in the Hymn Book of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.]

[TEIL TREE. The lime or linden; but see OAK.]

[TEKEL. See BELSHAZZAR.]

[TEKOA. A town six miles south of Bethlehem: it gave name to an adjacent portion of the Judean desert, 2 Sam. xiv. 2: 2 Chron. xi. 6; xx. 20: Amos i. 1. In 765 it was inhabited by Christians; so also in the time of the Crusades; but it was sacked by the Turks in 1138. Its remains, called Tekû'a, cover four or five acres of the top of a hill: they consist of the ruins of a tower and of a church, among which is a baptismal font, foundations of squared and bevelled stones, and cisterns.]

[TELABIB. Ezek. iii. 15. A town on the Chebar, supposed to be the modern Thelabar.]

[TELASSAR. Isa. xxxvii. 12. A province of Asia, supposed to have been near the sources of the Euphrates and Tigris. Some identify it with Tel-harsa. Ezra ii. 59: Neh. vii. 61.]

[TEMA. Son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 15. He is supposed to have founded Thema in Arabia Deserta. Ptolemy places a Themma in Arabia Deserta, near the Chaldean mountains. Job speaks of the caravans of Tema and Sheba, Job vi. 19.]

[TEMAN. Grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 11. He is supposed to have settled Thæman, which Eusebius places five miles from Petra. Gen. xxxvi. 34: Job. ii. 7: Jer. xlix. 7-22: Ezek. xxv. 18: Amos i. 12.]

[TEMPERANCE. Ἐγκράτεια, self-government; moderation in the indulgence of the appetites and passions; continence. Acts xxiv. 25: Gal. v. 23: 2 Peter i. 6. The verb and adjective are used in this sense, 1 Cor. vii. 9; ix. 25: Titus i. 8.]

[TEMPLARS. See KNIGHTS-TEMPLAR.]

TEMPLE, the house of God; properly the temple of Solomon. David first conceived the design of building a house somewhat worthy of the Divine majesty, and opened his mind to the prophet Nathan. 2 Sam. vii.: 1 Chron. xvii.; xxii. 8, etc. God accepted of his good intentions, but refused him the honor. Solomon laid the foundation of the temple, A. M. 2992, completed it in 3000, and dedicated it in 3001. 1 Kings viii. 2: 2 Chron. v., vi., vii. According to the opinion of some writers, there were three temples, namely, the first, erected by Solomon; the second, by Zerubbabel, and Joshua the high-priest; and the third, by Herod, a few years before the birth of Christ. But this opinion is, very properly, rejected by the Jews; who do not allow the third to be a new temple, but only the second temple repaired and beautified; and this opinion corresponds with the prophecy of Haggai, (ii. 9.) "that the glory of this latter house," the temple built by Zerubbabel, "should be greater than that of the former;" which prediction was uttered with reference to the Messiah's honoring it with his presence and ministry. The first temple is that which usually bears the name of Solomon; the materials for which were provided by David before his death, though the edifice was raised by his son. It stood on Mount Moriah, an eminence of the mountainous ridge in the Scriptures termed Mount Zion, Psalm cxxxii. 13, 14, which had been purchased by Araunah, or Ornan, the Jebusite. 2 Sam. xxiv. 23, 24: 1 Chron. xxi. 25. The plan, and the whole model of this superb structure, were formed after that of the tabernacle, but of much larger dimensions. It was surrounded, except at the front or east end, by three stories of chambers, each five cubits square, which reached to half the height of the temple; and the front was ornamented with a magnificent portico, which rose to the height of one hundred and twenty cubits: so that the form of the whole edifice was not unlike that of some ancient churches, which have a lofty tower in the front, and a low aisle running along each side of the building. The utensils for the sacred service were the same; excepting that several of them, as the altar, candlestick, etc., were larger, in proportion to the more spacious edifice to which they belonged. Seven years and six months were occupied in the erection of the superb and magnificent temple of Solomon, by whom it was dedicated, A. M. 3001, B. C. 999, with peculiar solemnity, to the worship of the Most High; who on this occasion vouchsafed to honor it with the shekinah, or visible manifestation of his presence. Various attempts have been made to describe the proportions and several parts of this structure; but as scarcely any two writers agree on this subject, a minute description of it is designedly omitted. It retained its pristine splendor only thirty-three or thirty-four years, when Shishak, King of Egypt, took Jerusalem, and carried away the treasures of the temple; and after undergoing subsequent profanations and pilages, this stupendous building was finally plundered and burnt by the Chaldeans, under Nebuchadnezzar, A. M. 3416, or B. C. 584. 2 Kings xxv. 13-15: 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17-20.

After the captivity, the temple emerged from its ruins, being rebuilt by Zerubbabel, but with vastly inferior and diminished glory; as appears from the tears of the aged men who had beheld the former structure in all its grandeur. Ezra iii. 12. The second temple was profaned by order of Antiochus Epiphanes, A. M. 3837, B. C. 163, who caused the daily sacrifices to be discontinued, and erected the image of Jupiter Olympus on the altar of burnt-offering. In this condition it continued three years, 1 Mace. iv. 42, when Judas Maccabæus purified and repaired it, and restored the sacrifices and true worship of Jehovah. Some years before the birth of our Saviour, the repairing and beautifying of this second temple, which had become decayed in the lapse of five centuries, was undertaken by Herod the Great, who for nine years employed eighty thousand workmen upon it, and spared no expense to render it equal, if not superior, in magnitude, splendor, and beauty, to any thing among mankind. Josephus calls it a work the most admirable of any that had ever been seen or heard of, both for its curious structure and its magnitude, and also for the vast wealth expended upon it, as well as for the universal reputation of its sanctity. But though Herod accomplished his original design in the time above specified, yet the Jews continued to ornament and enlarge it, expending the sacred treasure in annexing additional buildings to it; so that they might with great propriety assert that their temple had been forty and six years in building. John ii. 20.

Before we proceed to describe this venerable edifice, it may be proper to remark, that by the temple is to be understood not only the fabric or house itself, which, by way of eminence, is called the temple, namely, the holy of holies, the sanctuary, and the several courts both of the priests and Israelites, but also all the numerous chambers and rooms which this prodigious edifice comprehended, and each of which had its respective degree of holiness, increasing in proportion to its contiguity to the holy of holies. This remark it will be necessary to bear in mind, lest the reader of Scripture should be led to suppose that whatever is there said to be transacted in the temple, was actually done in the interior of that sacred edifice. To this infinite number of apartments into which the temple was disposed, our Lord refers, John xiv. 2; and by a very striking and magnificent simile, borrowed from them, he represents those numerous seats and mansions of heavenly bliss which his Father's house contained, and which were prepared for the everlasting abode of the righteous. The imagery is singularly beautiful and happy when considered as an allusion to the temple, which our Lord not unfrequently called his Father's house.

The second temple, originally built by Zerubbabel after the captivity, and repaired by Herod, differed in several respects from that erected by Solomon, although they agreed in others.

The temple erected by Solomon was more splendid and magnificent than the second temple, which was deficient in five remarkable things that constituted the chief glory of the first: these were, the ark and the mercy-seat; the shekinah, or manifestation of the Divine presence in the holy of holies; the sacred fire on the altar, which had been first kindled from heaven; the urim and thummim; and the spirit of prophecy. But the second temple surpassed the first in glory, being honored by the frequent presence of our Divine Saviour, agreeably to the prediction of Haggai, ii. 9. Both, however, were erected upon the same site, a very hard rock, encompassed by a very frightful precipice, and the foundation was laid with incredible expense and labor. The superstructure was not inferior to this great work: the height of the temple wall, especially on the south side, was stupendous. In the lowest places it was three hundred cubits, or four hundred and fifty feet, and in some places even greater. This most magnificent pile was constructed with hard white stones of prodigious magnitude. The temple itself, strictly so called, which comprised the portico, the sanctuary, and the holy of holies, formed only a small part of the sacred edifice on Mount Moriah, being surrounded by spacious courts, making a square of half a mile in circumference. It was entered through nine gates, which were on every side thickly coated with gold and silver; but there was one gate without the holy house, which was of Corinthian brass, the most precious metal in ancient times, and which far surpassed the others in beauty; for while these were of equal magnitude, the gate composed of Corinthian brass was much larger, its height being fifty cubits, and its doors forty cubits, and its ornaments both of gold and silver being far more costly and massive. This is supposed to have been the "gate called Beautiful" in Acts iii. 2, where Peter and John, in the name of Christ, healed a man who had been lame from his birth. The first or outer court, which encompassed the holy house and the other courts, was named the court of the Gentiles, because the latter were allowed to enter into it, but were prohibited from advancing farther. It was surrounded by a range of porticoes, or cloisters, above which were galleries, or apartments, supported by pillars of white marble, each consisting of a single piece, and twenty-five cubits in height. One of these was called Solomon's porch, or piazza, because it stood on a vast terrace, which he had originally raised from a valley beneath, four hundred cubits high, in order to enlarge the area on the top of the mountain, and make it equal to the plan of his intended building; and as this terrace was the only work of Solomon that remained in the second temple, the piazza which stood upon it retained the name of that prince. Here it was that our Lord was walking at the feast of dedication, John x. 23; and that the lame man, when healed by Peter and John, glorified God before all the people. Acts iii. 11. This superb portico is termed the royal portico by Josephus, who represents it as the noblest work beneath the sun, being elevated to such a prodigious height, that no one could look down from its flat roof to the valley below without being seized with dizziness, the sight not reaching to such an immeasurable depth. The south-east corner of the roof of this portico, where the height was the greatest, is supposed to have been the περὺβιον, pinnacle, or extreme angle, whence Satan tempted our Saviour to precipitate himself. Matt. iv. 5: Luke iv. 9. This also was the spot where it was predicted that the abomination of desolation, or the Roman ensigns, should stand. Daniel ix. 27: Matt. xxiv. 15. Solomon's portico was situated in the eastern front of the temple, opposite to the Mount of Olives, where our Saviour is said to have sat when his disciples came to show him the grandeur of its various buildings, of which, grand as they were, he said the time was approaching when one stone should not be left upon another. Matt. xxiv. 1-3. This outer court being assigned to the Gentile proselytes, the Jews, who did not worship in it themselves, conceived that it might lawfully be put to profane uses; for here we find that the buyers and sellers of animals for sacrifices, and also the money-changers, had stationed themselves, until Jesus Christ, awing them into submission by the grandeur and dignity of his person and behavior, expelled them; telling them that it was the house of prayer for all nations, and was not to be profaned. Matt. xxi. 12, 13: Mark xi. 15-17. Within the court of the Gentiles stood the court of the Israelites, divided into two parts, or courts; the outer one being appropriated to the women, and the inner one to the men. The court of the women was separated from that of the Gentiles by a low stone wall or partition, of elegant construction, on which stood pillars at equal distances, with inscriptions in Greek and Latin, importing that no alien should enter into the holy place. To this wall St. Paul most evidently alludes in Eph. ii. 13, 14: "But now in Christ Jesus, ye, who sometimes were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ; for he is our peace, who hath made both one, [united both Jews and Gentiles into one Church,] and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us;" having abolished the law of ordinances, by which, as by the wall of separation, both Jews and Gentiles were not only kept asunder, but also at variance. In this court was the treasury, over against which Christ sat, and beheld how the people threw their voluntary offerings into it for furnishing the victims and other things necessary for the sacrifices. Mark xii. 41: John viii. 20. From the court of the women, which was on higher ground than that of the Gentiles, there was an ascent of fifteen steps into the inner or men's court, and so called because it was appropriated to the worship of the male Israelites. In these two courts, collectively termed the court of the Israelites, were the people praying, each apart by himself, for the pardon of his sins, while Zacharias was offering incense within the sanctuary. Luke i. 10. Within the court of the Israelites was that of the priests, which was separated from it by a low wall, one cubit in height. This enclosure surrounded the altar of burnt-offerings, and to it the people brought their oblations and sacrifices; but the priests alone were permitted to enter it. From this court twelve steps ascended to the temple, strictly so called, which was divided into three parts—the portico, the outer sanctuary, and the holy place. In the portico was suspended the splendid votive offerings made by the piety of various individuals. Among other treasures, there was a golden table, given by Pompey, and several golden vines of exquisite workmanship, as well as of immense size; for Josephus relates that there were clusters as tall as a man. And he adds, that all around were fixed up and displayed the spoils and trophies taken by Herod from the barbarians and Arabians. These votive offerings, it should seem, were visible at a distance; for when Jesus Christ was sitting on the Mount of Olives, and his disciples called his attention to the temple, they pointed out to him the gifts with which it was adorned. Luke xxi. 5. This porch had a very large portal or gate, which, instead of folding-doors, was furnished with a costly Babylonian veil, of many colors, that mystically denoted the universe. From this the sanctuary, or holy place, was separated from the holy of holies by a double veil, which is supposed to have been the veil that was rent in twain at our Saviour's crucifixion; thus emblematically pointing out that the separation between Jews and Gentiles was abolished, and that the privilege of the high-priest was communicated to all mankind, who might henceforth have access to the throne of grace through the one great Mediator, Jesus Christ. Heb. x. 19-22. The holy of holies was twenty cubits square: into it no person was admitted but the high-priest, who entered it once a year, on the great day of atonement. Exod. xxx. 10: Lev. xvi. 2, 15, 34: Heb. ix. 2-7.

Magnificent as the rest of the sacred edifice was, it was infinitely surpassed in splendor by the inner temple, or sanctuary. Its appearance, according to Josephus, had every thing that could strike the mind or astonish the sight; for it was covered on every side with plates of gold, so that when the sun rose upon it, it reflected so strong and dazzling an effulgence that the eye of the spectator was obliged to turn away, being no more able to sustain its radiance than the splendor of the sun. To strangers who were approaching, it appeared at a distance like a mountain covered with snow; for where it was not decorated with plates of gold, it was extremely white and glistening. On the top it had sharp-pointed spikes of gold, to prevent any bird from resting upon it and polluting it. There were, continues the Jewish historian, in that building several stones which were forty-five cubits in length, five in height, and six in breadth. "When all these things are considered," says Harwood, "how natural is the exclamation of the disciples when viewing this immense building at a distance: 'Master, see what manner of stones' (ποταποὶ λίθοι, 'what very large oaes') 'and what buildings are here!' Mark xiii. 1. And how wonderful is the declaration of our Lord upon this! how unlikely to be accomplished before the race of men who were then living should cease to exist! 'Seest thou these great buildings? There shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down.' Improbable as this prediction must have appeared to the disciples at that time, in the short space of about thirty years after, it was exactly accomplished, and this most magnificent temple, which the Jews had literally turned into a den of thieves, through the righteous judgment of God upon that wicked and abandoned nation, was utterly destroyed by the Romans, A. D. 70 or 73 of the vulgar era, on the same month, and on the same day of the month, when Solomon's temple had been razed to the ground by the Babylonians!"

Both the first and second temples were contemplated by the Jews with the highest reverence. Of their affectionate regard for the first temple, and for Jerusalem, within whose walls it was built, we have several instances in those Psalms which were composed during the Babylonish captivity; and of their profound veneration for the second temple we have repeated examples in the New Testament. They could not bear any disrespectful or dishonorable thing to be said of it. The least injurious slight of it, real or apprehended, instantly awakened all the choler of a Jew, and was an affront never to be forgiven. Our Saviour, in the course of his public instructions, having said, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up again," John ii. 19, it was construed into a contemptuous disrespect, designedly thrown out against the temple: his words instantly descended into the heart of the Jews, and kept rankling there for some years; for, upon his trial, this declaration, which it was impossible for a Jew ever to forget or to forgive, was immediately alleged against him, as big with the most atrocious guilt and impiety: they told the court they had heard him publicly assert, "I am able to destroy this temple." Matt. xxvi. 61. The rancor and virulence they had conceived against him for this speech was not softened by all the affecting circumstances of that wretched death they saw him die: even as he hung upon the cross, with triumph, scorn, and exultation they upbraided him with it, contemptuously shaking their heads, and saying, "Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself! If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross!" Matt. xxvii. 40. It only remains to add, that it appears, from several passages of Scripture, the Jews had a body of soldiers who guarded the temple to prevent any disturbances during the ministration of such an immense number of priests and Levites. To this guard Pilate referred when he said to the chief priests and Pharisees who waited upon him to desire he would make the sepulchre secure, "Ye have a watch: go your way, and make it as secure as ye can." Matt. xxvii. 65. Over these guards one person had the supreme command, who in several places is called the captain of the temple, or officer of the temple guard. "And as they spake unto the people, the priests, and the captain of the temple, and the Sadducees, came upon them." Acts iv. 1; v. 25, 26: John xviii. 12. Josephus mentions such an officer.

[Josephus says that when Jerusalem was taken by the Romans, Terentius Rufus caused a plough to be driven over all the courts of the temple, thereby verifying the predictions of Micah, iv. 12, and of Christ, Mark xiii. 1, 2. In the year 136, Adrian erected a temple of Jupiter on the site of the temple, and probably rebuilt the walls of the area, as the Golden Gateway in the eastern wall seems to be of this era. Bonomi and Catherwood, who saw the interior, say that "a central row of noble Corinthian columns, and a groined roof, had once formed a stately portico of Roman workmanship." It is not known when Adrian's temple was demolished. The statues, including an equestrian statue of Adrian, remained there until the fourth century, even after the abortive attempt of the Jews, under Julian, to rebuild their temple. See Jerome on Isa. ii. and Matt. xxi., and Guizot's Gibbon. In the sixth century Justinian erected a church to the Virgin, which is identified by some with the Mosque of Aksa, at the southern extremity of the Haram. It is two hundred and eighty feet in length from north to south, by one hundred and ninety in breadth. Bonomi and others describe it as an ancient church. In 636 the Mohammedans took Jerusalem, and the Caliph Omar erected a mosque on the celebrated rock es-Sukhras, which is usually regarded as the present Mosque of Omar, though the Arabian historians say that the Caliph Abd el-Melek caused it to be rebuilt, A. D. 686-693. It is called Kubbel es-Sukhras, "Dome of the Rock." The exterior walls seem to have been built up at the same time. In 1099 the Crusaders took the city, and slew more than ten thousand Mussulmans in the sacred place—the Arabs say seventy thousand. The great mosque was converted into a church, called Templum Domini. A portion of Aksa was assigned to the Knights Templars, in 1119, and perhaps King Baldwin himself also lived in it, as it is called the "Palace," as well as the "Portico," or "Temple of Solomon." In 1187, Saladin took the city, and purified the sacred precincts with Damascus rose-water; and from that time to the present, with a slight exception, they have remained in the hands of the Mussulmans, who esteem es-Sukhras as second alone to the Ka'bah of Mecca. The entire enclosure was formerly called Mesjid el-Aksa, "the remotest of the holy places," as distinguished from Mecca and Medina. It is now called el-Haram-esh-Sherif, "the noble sanctuary." The walls and ground are composed of the materials of former structures; and the famous seat of Mohammed, where he is to sit and judge the world, is a broken shaft, worked in horizontally across the upper part of the eastern wall, and projecting somewhat over the Valley of Jehoshaphat. In 1833, Mr. Catherwood occupied six weeks in investigating and sketching the interior of the Haram. How he gained access to it is related in a letter published in Bartlett's "Views of Jerusalem," which contains a minute description of what he saw. In the area of the Haram there is a platform raised fifteen or sixteen feet, which extends four hundred and fifty eastward, and five hundred and fifty north to south. It is partly paved with marble, and has on it a pulpit and praying-places, one of which is said to have been used by Fatima, and another, pointing to Mecca, which they say was the judgment-seat of David. Under and attached to it are apartments for poor pilgrims. The great Mosque of Omar, which stands on this platform, is octagonal, each side measuring sixty-seven feet. The lower division of the wall is of various-colored marbles, elegantly arranged. The other portion is pierced with fifty-six pointed windows, filled with beautiful stained glass. The piers separating the windows, and the circular wall supporting the dome, are decorated with glazed tiles, of bright colors and various patterns. The dome is double, of elegant form, covered with lead, and surmounted by a tall gilt crescent. The mosque is entered by four doors, opposite the cardinal points: the southern is the principal, having a porch supported by marble columns; the others have enclosed marble porches, and in the west porch is a well, which Mr. Catherwood suggests may communicate with the Fountain of the Virgin. But see POOL. A corridor, thirteen feet wide, runs round the building inside, having eight piers and sixteen Corinthian columns of marble. A second corridor, thirty feet wide, also runs round it. The interior diameter is ninety-eight feet: the dome is sixty feet in diameter, and is supported by four massive stone piers and twelve Corinthian marble columns, which are connected by arches, from which springs the circular wall, whose interior, as well as the dome, is ornamented with gilt stucco in the Arabesque style. The dome is of wood, portions of it elaborately carved. Under it is the famous limestone rock, which appears to be the natural surface of Moriah. It is surrounded by a gilt iron railing, and covered with a crimson silk canopy. At the south-east corner of the rock is an excavated chamber, called the Noble Cave, reached by steps. Its area is about six hundred feet, average height seven, with a plain surface, and a few small altars. It is held sacred as the praying-place of Abraham, David, Solomon, and Jesus. In the centre of the rocky pavement is a circular slab of marble, under which is an excavation called "the Well of Souls," where they remain till the resurrection! The corridors of the mosque are airy, light, and elegant: the dome is sombre and impressive. South of the platform of the Mosque of Omar, reached by a paved footway, shaded by cypresses, at the distance of three hundred and fifty feet, is the Mosque el-Aksa, occupying the remaining space of two hundred and eighty feet, extending to the southern wall of the Haram. It consists of a nave and six side aisles, the entire breadth being one hundred and eighty feet. The columns and piers are irregular, some being Roman, some Saracenic; so that if this is the church built by Justinian, it must have been altered by the Mohammedans. At the southern extremity is a beautiful dome, under which is a singing-gallery and a pulpit. Attached to the south-west angle is the Mosque of Abu Bekr, two hundred feet by fifty-five. Down the centre is a row of eight piers, from which arches cross to the sides. At right angles with this is the Mosque of the Mogrebins, two hundred feet long. At the opposite end, on the edge of the wall, is the small Mosque of Omar, eighty-five feet long.

Attached to this mosque is one still smaller, that of the "Forty Prophets." Offices connected with the mosque project beyond the wall of the Haram. In this mosque there is a well, and also a large enclosure for the women, who are not allowed to enter the Mosque of Omar. Under the Mosque of Aksa is the entrance to the ancient gateway, which is apparently of the age and style of the Golden Gateway: it is two hundred and eighty feet long, and, by steps and an inclined plane, the way through it ascends to the level of the area. Beneath the dome, at the south-east angle of the Haram, is a small subterranean place of prayer. This chamber forms the entrance to the extensive vaults which support the level platform of the mosque above. There are fifteen rows of square pillars, from which the arches spring. Richardson says the pillars have a much older appearance than the arches which they support. The ground rises rapidly to the north and west, so that the northern arches are only ten feet high, while the southern are thirty-five. Portions of the vaulting now walled up may have been used as cisterns, supplied with water from the roofs of the buildings, and by the aqueduct from Solomon's pools. It is a general belief that there is a living spring under the vaults of the temple—the fons perennis aquæ of Tacitus—from which some of the fountains adjacent are supplied with water; and some think this is alluded to, Ps. xlv. 4; lxxxvii. 7: Isa. xii. 3: Ezek. xlvii. 1-5: John vii. 37, 38. Mr. Catherwood thinks this whole substruction was of Roman origin, and that it, the Golden Gate, and that beneath the el-Aksa, and the ancient bridge over the Tyropœon, formed a plan of foundations and approaches to Herod's temple. At the southern end of the chapel are four columns, supporting a small dome, under which is a stone sarcophagus, in Roman style, called "the Tomb of our Lord Issa," i. e., Jesus, which is much revered by the Mohammedans. From the south-east angle of the wall to the Golden Gateway, there is nothing remarkable. Its exterior presents two archways of Roman character, resting on capitals of the same style, filled up with Saracenic masonry. The interior length of the gateway is seventy feet, breadth thirty-five. It is divided into a double arcade, surmounted at one end by two cupolas, which admit the light. The walls are eleven feet thick. There can be no question that the Haram occupies the site of the temple. Mr. Catherwood says the lower courses of the masonry of ancient walls exist on the east, south, and west sides of the enclosure, and the north side is marked by a wall on the brink of a deep trench, and at the north-west inner angle by an excavation in the rock to the extent of twenty feet in some places. He says the eastern wall is fifteen hundred and twenty feet long, the south nine hundred and forty, the west sixteen hundred and seventeen, the north one thousand and twenty. This differs from the account of Josephus, who says the area of the temple was a square, four stadia, or, including the fortress Antonia, six stadia in circumference. At one thousand and fifty feet north from the south-east angle is the Golden Gate, which gave entrance into the city, if the temple area was square, otherwise into the temple, and thus may have been that by which, tradition says, Christ entered the temple from Olivet. The site of the temple had to be levelled by raising it at the south-east, and lowering it at the north-west. The latter was done by cutting into the rock, and is the only work which can with certainty be referred to the age of Solomon. At the north side stood the fortress of Antonia, and at the north-west angle the Via Dolorosa passes within one hundred feet of the temple area, which does not give room enough for the fortress. But Mr. Catherwood suggests that a larger space northward may be appropriated for this purpose; and the deep trench, spoken of by authors, would then be its defence on the east, and the scarped work on its south face a defence to the temple on that side, and still leave six hundred feet for the length of the fortress, by a width of two hundred. The Mosque of Omar is nearly in the centre between the southern and northern walls, and one third nearer the western than the eastern wall, allowing deeper porticoes facing Olivet. The rock is sixty by fifty feet, projecting five feet above the pavement, which is twelve feet above the level of the enclosure. If the area of the temple was square, it must have stood within less than one hundred feet from the north wall, an unsightly and inconvenient mass of rock; whereas Mr. Catherwood adopts the old Christian tradition, that it formed the foundation of the holy of holies of Solomon's temple—the platform, five hundred feet on each side, indicating the position of the inner court. He thinks the arches at the south-east angle, built to raise that end, are of the time of Herod, arches not being in use in the time of Solomon. He sees no proof of antiquity in the bevelled edges which induced Dr. Robinson to refer this work to that monarch. He considers the springing-stones of the arch of the bridge which spanned the Tyropœon to be of the same date. This bridge is spoken of several times by Josephus, who says that it connected the upper city at the Xystus with the temple; and that the party of Aristobulus, who were opposed to the delivery of the city to Pompey, seized upon the temple and cut off the bridge which reached from it to the city. A fragment of a bridge at this point was noticed by Catherwood, and has been described by Robinson and others, who identify it with the bridge of Josephus. Robinson says three courses of its stones still remain, some of the stones being each more than twenty feet long. The arch measures fifty-one feet along the wall, its southern side being thirty-nine feet from the south-east corner of the Haram. The distance across to the precipitous natural rock of Zion, measured as exactly as the intervening field of prickly pear would permit, was found to be three hundred and fifty feet. On account of "mean houses and filth," no traces of its western termination could be discovered. Not three hundred feet north of this bridge, immediately under the wall, concealed from view, is the "Wailing Place" of the Jews, who have purchased permission from the Turks to approach the boundary of the temple to wail over the desolation of Zion, and to pray for the restoration of Israel. Dr. Olin says, they keep the pavement swept with great care, take off their shoes, stand and kneel toward the wall, gaze in silence on its venerable stones, and sometimes sob aloud. He considers this wall and the others like it, as well as the bridge, the work of Solomon. See "Travels," chap. vii.; also, Robinson's "Researches," 1838 and 1852: Stanley's "Sinai and Palestine." Very minute descriptions of the temple and its precincts, collected from Josephus and the Talmud, with illustrations and maps, one of them taken from the late English Military Survey, as given in Williams's "Holy City," and collated citations from the works of various travellers, may be found in an Appendix to Strong's "Harmony of the Gospels.]"

[TEMPTATION. מסה, Massah, means trial, proof. God tempts man by commands, Gen. xxii. 1: Exod. xx. 20; by miracles, Exod. xvi. 4: Deut. iv. 34; viii. 2, 16; xxix. 8; by afflictions, Job ix. 28; so πειρασμός, Luke viii. 13; xxii. 28: Acts xx. 19: Gal. iv. 14: James i. 2, 12: 1 Pet. iv. 12; by permitting him to be solicited to sin, Deut. xiii. 3: Judg. iii. 1-4: Matt. iv. 1: Heb. iv. 15: in this sense God himself never "tempteth any man," James i. 13, 14; so that when we pray, "Lead us not into temptation," we use a Hebrew idiom, q. d., "Let us not be overcome by temptation." The devil is "the tempter," by emphasis, Matt. iv. 1-11. In tempting Christ, he could not have supposed it possible to prevail against his Divine nature; but he might have imagined that his humanity was not absolutely indefectible. Man tempts God by unbelief, Exod. xvii. 7: Deut. vi. 16: Ps. xcv. 8, 9: Heb. iii. 8, 9; by presumption, Matt. iv. 6, 7. God may be tested or proved in a good sense, Judges vi. 39, 40: Mal. iii. 10.]

[TEN ARTICLES. "Articles devised by the King's Highness Majesty, to stablish Christian quietness and unity among us," sanctioned by convocation, in 1536. They were probably drawn up by Cranmer. Five related to doctrines: 1. Scripture and the three creeds are the basis and summary of faith; 2. Baptism is absolutely necessary for children and adults; 3. Penance, consisting of contrition, confession, and reformation, is necessary; 4. The body and blood of Christ are really present in the elements of the eucharist; 5. Justification is remission of sin and reconciliation to God; but good works are necessary. Five related to discipline: 1. Images are useful as remembrancers, but are not to be worshipped; 2. Saints are to be honored as examples of life, and as furthering our prayers; 3. Saints may be invoked as intercessors, and their days observed; 4. Ceremonies are to be observed; 5. Prayers for the dead are useful; but not papal pardon and soul-masses offered at certain localities. These Articles were the basis of "The Bishops' Book.]"

[TENT. A movable habitation, consisting of poles and skins, linen, or some other cloth, fastened with cords. Gen. iv. 20: Exod. xxxv. 25, 26; xxxvi. 1: Isa. iv. 6. It is sometimes divided into apartments by curtains. See TABERNACLE.]

[TENTH-DEAL. The tenth-part of an ephah—1003

an omer—about five pints. Exod. xvi. 36; xxix. 40: Num. xxviii. 5.]

TENT-MAKER. St. Paul, according to the practice of the Jews, who, however opulent, always taught their children some trade, appears to have been a tent-maker. This, however, is understood by some moderns to mean a maker of tent-cloth, St. Paul being a Cilician, a country which produced a species of rough-haired goats, from which the Cilicians manufactured a thick and coarse cloth, much used for tents. The fathers, however, say that he made military tents, the material of which was skins. [Acts xviii. 3.]

[TERAH. Abraham's father. Gen. xi. 24-32.]

TERAPHIM. It is said, Gen. xxxi. 19, that Rachel had stolen the images (teraphim) of her father. What then were these teraphim? The Septuagint translates this word by "oracle," and sometimes by "vain figures." Aquila generally translates it by "figures." It appears, indeed, from all the passages in which this word is used, that they were idols or superstitious figures. Some Jewish writers tell us the teraphim were human heads placed in niches, and consulted by way of oracles. Others think they were talismans, or figures of metal, cast and engraven under certain aspects of the planets, to which they ascribed extraordinary effects. All the eastern people are much addicted to this superstition, and the Persians still call them telefin, a name nearly approaching to teraphim. M. Jurieu supposes them to have been a sort of dii penates, or household gods; and this appears to be, perhaps, the most probable opinion.

[The Hutchinsonians, who think the cherubim were representations of the Trinity with the humanity of Christ, imagine that the teraphim were a kind of domestic cherubim. Though the word is plural, yet the singular pronoun is used in speaking of it—"his, or its, bolster," 1 Sam. xix. 13, 16—as if it were one image in a compound form, or having several heads. Kimchi, Abarbanel, and others, think the teraphim were images in human form, consulted to tell fortunes. Michal's seems to have been in the form of a man. When Hosea says that Israel should be many days without a king, prince, sacrifice, statue, ephod, and teraphim, he seems to mean that they should be deprived of their civil and ecclesiastical privileges, and should not observe the idolatrous customs, public and private, to which they and their forefathers had been addicted. The word teraphim occurs only in Gen. xxxi. 19, 34, 35: Judg. xvii. 5; xviii. 14, 18, 20: 1 Sam. xv. 23; xix. 13, 16: 2 Kings xxiii. 24: Ezek. xxi. 21: Hos. iii. 4: Zech. x. 2.]

[TERTIUS. Paul's amanuensis. Rom. xvi. 22.]

[TERTULLUS. A Roman orator, or barrister, ῥήτωρ, employed by the sanhedrim against Paul. He seems to have spoken in Latin. In his fulsome eulogy of Felix, we find διὰ τῆς σῆς προνοίας, which is the Latin tuâ providentiâ, rendered "by thy providence,"—the only place in our version where that word occurs. Acts xxiv. 1-9.]

[TESSERÆ. See TOKENS.]

[TEST-ACT. An Act of Parliament which forced all civil and military officers to take the oaths of supremacy and abjuration, and the Lord's Supper as administered in the established Church, under severe penalties. It was repealed in 1828.]

TESTAMENT. The property or estate of the father fell, after his decease, into the possession of his sons, who divided it among themselves equally, with this exception, that the eldest son had two portions. The father expressed his last wishes or will in the presence of witnesses, and probably in the presence of the heirs. 2 Kings xx. 1. At a more recent period the will was made out in writing. The portion that was given to the sons of concubines depended altogether upon the feelings of the father. Abraham gave presents, to what amount is not known, both to Ishmael and to the sons whom he had by Keturah, and sent them away before his death. It does not appear that they had any other portion in the estate. But Jacob made the sons whom he had by his concubines heirs as well as the others. Gen. xxi. 8-21; xxv. 1-6; xlix. 1-27. Moses laid no restrictions upon the choice of fathers in this respect; and we should infer that the sons of concubines, for the most part, received an equal share with the other sons, from the fact that Jephthah, the son of a concubine, complained that he was excluded without any portion from his father's house. Judg. xi. 1-7. The daughters not only had no portion in the estate, but, if they were unmarried, were considered as making a part of it, and were sold by their brothers into matrimony. If they had no brothers, or if they had died, the daughters then took the estate. Num. xxvii. 1-8. If any one died intestate, and without offspring, the property was disposed of according to Num. xxvii. 8-11. The servants or the slaves in a family could not claim any share in the estate as a right; but the person who made a will might, if he chose, make them his heirs. Gen. xv. 3. Indeed, in some instances, those who had heirs, recognized as such by law, did not deem it unbecoming to bestow the whole or a portion of their estates on faithful and deserving servants. Prov. xvii. 2. The widow of the deceased, like his daughters, had no legal right to a share in the estate. The sons, however, or other relations, were bound to afford her an adequate maintenance, unless it had been otherwise arranged in the will. She sometimes returned back again to her father's house, particularly if the support which the heirs gave her was not such as had been promised, or was not sufficient. Gen. xxxviii. 11. See also the story of Ruth. The prophets very frequently, and undoubtedly not without cause, exclaim against the neglect and injustice shown to widows. Isa. i. 17; x. 2: Jer. vi. 6; xxii. 8: Ezek. xxii. 7: Exod. xxii. 22-24: Deut. x. 18; xxiv. 17.

[Διαθήκη is sometimes rendered testament; but, says Junius, "it signifies neither a testament, nor a covenant, nor an agreement, but, as the import of the word simply requires, a disposition or institution of God;" as that appointed to the patriarchs, Acts iii. 25; to Israel, Heb. viii. 9; to Christians, Matt. xxvi. 28: Heb. vii. 22; viii. 6; called new in respect to the Sinaitic, which is called old, 2 Cor. iii. 6: Heb. viii. 8, 13; ix. 15; hence the word is applied to the books in which each is contained, 2 Cor. iii. 14. On the famous passage, Heb. ix. 15-20, Conybeare and Howson say, "The Authorized Version is unquestionably correct in translating διαθήκη, testament, in this passage. The attempts which have been made to avoid this meaning are irreconcilable with any natural explanation of ὁ διαθέτης, (testator.) The simple and obvious translation should not be departed from in order to avoid a difficulty; and the difficulty vanishes when we consider the rhetorical character of the Epistle. The statement in this verse is not meant as a logical argument, but as a rhetorical illustration, which is suggested to the writer by the ambiguity of the word διαθήκη." So Calvin, Crellius, Bengel, Rose, Stuart, and many others. See the arguments, pro and con, in Bloomfield, Macknight, and A. Clarke. The word, meaning a dispensation or disposition, can be used in a promissory sense, as Grotius says on Gal. iii. 15, a pactional, or a testamentary. See COVENANT.]

TESTIMONY, a witnessing, evidence, or proof. Acts xiv. 8. The whole Scripture, or word of God, which declares what is to be believed, practiced, and expected by us, is called God's "testimony," and sometimes in the plural, "testimonies." Psalm xix. 7; [cxix.] The two tables of stone on which the law or ten commandments were written, which were witnesses of that covenant made between God and his people, and testified what it was that God had required of them, have the same title. Exod. xxv. 16, 21; xxxi. 18. [So has the gospel. 1 Cor. i. 6.]

TETRARCH, a sovereign prince that has the fourth part of a state, province, or kingdom under his dominion, without wearing the diadem, or bearing the title of king: Matt. xiv. 1: Luke iii. 1, 19: ix. 7: Acts xiii. 1.

[TEXT. Text comes from texus, texo, to weave, and means that which is woven or wrought into a composition, as distinguished from the gloss, which in ancient MSS. is placed in the margin. In some there is an interlinear gloss, written in smaller letters than the text, which is written in a large bold hand, hence called text-hand. The word text has been appropriated to a passage of Scripture which a preacher makes the subject of a discourse; and also to a passage cited in proof or illustration of any point. A textuary is "one who is well versed in the Scriptures, and can readily quote texts." Thus Bishop Bull: "If by a textuary we mean him who hath not only a concordance of scriptures in his memory, but also a commentary on them in his understanding; who thinks it not enough to be ready in alleging the bare words of Scripture, with the mention of chapter and verse where it is written, unless he knows the sense and meaning of what he recites: the former every illiterate sectary is able to do, who can quote scriptures by dozens and scores, the tithe whereof he understands not, and are little to his purpose: the latter is the proper commendation of the divine."]

[THEATINS. An order founded in 1524, by the Bishop of Theate, or Chieti, in Naples, John Peter Caraffa, afterward Pope Paul IV. It was instituted to oppose the Reformation and revive religion in the Romish Church. The monks were bound by their vows to subsist on charity without begging; hence they are called "Regular Clerks of the Divine Providence;" they are also styled "Regular Clerks of the Community," "Apostolic Clerks," and "Pauline Clerks.]"

[THEBEZ. A city of Ephraim, Judg. ix. 50, 2 Sam. xi. 21, identified by Robinson with Tûbâs. He visited it in 1838 and 1852, and says it is a large village, containing a few families of Christians, the rest being Moslems. It is on the western slope of a fine basin, in the south-east part of which, less than a mile distant, is a hill with a ruin on it called 'Ainûn. "Here is precisely the name Ænon, but unfortunately there is no Salim near, nor a drop of water." Robinson verifies the statement of Eusebius and Jerome, who place Thebez thirteen Roman miles from Neapolis, on the way to Scythopolis.]

[THEODOSIANS. A branch of the Corrupticolæ, so called from Theodosius, the degraded Patriarch of Alexandria, who, with Themistius, a deacon of that city, asserted that Christ, as a man, was ignorant of many things. The other Monophysites charged them with predicated ignorance of the divinity of Christ, as they held that there is but one nature in the Son of God. Hence they are called Agnôitæ. They never prospered. See DAMIANISTS.—There is a sect of Russian dissenters called Theodosians. They are said to be strict in their morals, to purify by prayer what they get in the markets of unbelievers, and to omit to write the superscription on the crucifix.]

[THEODOTIANS. Followers of Theodotus, a tanner, and a man of profound learning, who taught at Rome in the second century, "that, at the birth of Christ, a certain Divine energy, or portion of the Divine nature, (and not the person of the Father, as Praxeas imagined,) united itself to him." They are also called Artemonites, from Artemon; though it is not certain that the latter agreed precisely with Theodotus. The disciples of both applied philosophy and geometry to the explanation of Christianity.]

[THEOPASCHITES. Followers of Peter, surnamed Fullo, from the trade of a fuller, which he exercised when a monk. He usurped the see of Antioch, and, after being deposed several times for his opposition to the Council of Chalcedon, was, in 482, established in it by the Emperor Zeno. He held that there was but one nature in Christ, and that suffered: hence the name.]

THEOPHILUS, one to whom St. Luke addresses the books of his Gospel and Acts of the Apostles, which he composed. Acts i. 1: Luke i. 3. It is doubted whether the name Theophilus be here the proper name of a man, or an appellative or common name, which, according to its etymology, may stand for any good man, or a lover of God. Some think this name is generic, and that St. Luke's design here is to address his work to those that love God; but it is much more probable that this Theophilus was a Christian to whom the evangelist has dedicated those two works; and the epithet of "most excellent," which is given to him, shows him to have been a man of great quality. (Ecumenius concludes from thence that he was governor or intendant of some province, because such a personage had generally the title of "most excellent" given to him. Grotius con-jectures he might be a magistrate of Achaia, converted by St. Luke.

THERAPEUTÆ. One particular phenomenon which resulted from the theosophico-ascetic spirit among the Alexandrian Jews, was the sect of the Therapeutæ. Their head-quarters were at no great distance from Alexandria, in a quiet pleasant spot on the shores of the Lake Moeris, where they lived, like the anchorites in later periods, shut up in separate cells, and employed themselves in nothing but prayer, and the contemplation of Divine things. An allegorical interpretation of Scripture was the foundation of their speculations; and they had old theosophical writings which gave them this turn. They lived only on bread and water, and accustomed themselves to fasting. They only ate in the evening, and many fasted for several days together. They met together every Sabbath day, and every seven weeks they held a still more solemn assembly, because the number seven was peculiarly holy in their estimation. They then celebrated a simple love-feast, consisting of bread with salt and hyssop; theosophical discussions were held, and the hymns which they had from their old traditions were sung; and mystical dances, bearing reference to the wonderful works of God with the fathers of their people, were continued, amidst choral songs, to a late hour in the night. Many men of distinguished learning have considered this sect as nothing but a scion of the Essenes, trained up under the peculiar influence of the Egyptian spirit.

THESSALONIANS, Christians of Thessalonica, to whom St. Paul sent two Epistles. It is recorded in the Acts, that St. Paul, in his first journey upon the continent of Europe, preached the gospel at Thessalonica, at that time the capital of Macedonia, with considerable success; but that after a short stay he was driven thence by the malice and violence of the unbelieving Jews. From Thessalonica St. Paul went to Berea, and thence to Athens, at both which places he remained but a short time. From Athens he sent Timothy to Thessalonica, to confirm the new converts in their faith, and to inquire into their conduct. Timothy, upon his return, found St. Paul at Corinth. Thence, probably in A. D. 52, St. Paul wrote the First Epistle to the Thessalonians; and it is to be supposed that the subjects of which it treats were suggested by the account which he received from Timothy. It is now generally believed that this was written the first of all St. Paul's Epistles, but it is not known by whom it was sent to Thessalonica. The Church there consisted chiefly of Gentile converts. 1 Thess. i. 9. St. Paul, after saluting the Thessalonian Christians in the name of himself, Silas, and Timothy, assures them that he constantly returned thanks to God on their account, and mentioned them in his prayers; he acknowledges the readiness and sincerity with which they embraced the gospel, and the great reputation which they had acquired by turning from idols to serve the living God, 1 Thess. i.; he reminds them of the bold and disinterested manner in which he had preached among them; comforts them under the persecutions which they, like other Christians, had experienced from their unbelieving countrymen, and informs them of two ineffectual attempts which he had made to visit them again, 1 Thess. ii.; and that being thus disappointed, he had sent Timothy to confirm their faith, and inquire into their conduct. he tells them that Timothy's account of them had given him the greatest consolation and joy in the midst of his affliction and distress, and that he continually prayed to God for an opportunity of seeing them again, and for their perfect establishment in the gospel, 1 Thess. iii.; he exhorts to purity, justice, love, and quietness, and dissuades them against excessive grief for their deceased friends, 1 Thess. iv.; hence he takes occasion to recommend preparation for the last judgment, the time of which is always uncertain; and adds a variety of practical precepts. He concludes with his usual benediction. This Epistle is written in terms of high commendation, earnestness, and affection.

It is generally believed that the messenger who carried the former Epistle into Macedonia, upon his return to Corinth, informed St. Paul that the Thessalonians had inferred, from some expressions in it, that the coming of Christ and the final judgment were near at hand, and would happen in the time of many who were then alive. 1 Thess. iv. 15, 17; v. 6. The principal design of the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians was to correct that error, and prevent the mischief which it would naturally occasion. It was written from Corinth, probably at the end of A. D. 52. St. Paul begins with the same salutation as in the former Epistle, and then expresses his devout acknowledgments to God for the increasing faith and mutual love of the Thessalonians in the midst of persecution; he represents to them the rewards which will be bestowed upon the faithful, and the punishment which will be inflicted upon the disobedient, at the coming of Christ, 2 Thess. i.; he earnestly entreats them not to suppose, as upon authority from him, or upon any other ground, that the last day is at hand; he assures them that before that awful period a great apostasy will take place, and reminds them of some information which he had given them upon that subject when he was at Thessalonica; he exhorts them to steadfastness in their faith, and prays to God to comfort their hearts, and establish them in every good word and work, 2 Thess. ii.; he desires their prayers for the success of his ministry, and expresses his confidence in their sincerity; he cautions them against associating with idle and disorderly persons, and recommends diligence and quietness. He adds a salutation in his own hand, and concludes with his usual benediction.

THESSALONICA, a celebrated city in Macedonia, and capital of that kingdom, standing upon the Thermaic Sea. Stephen of Byzantium says that it was improved and beautified by Philip, King of Macedon, and called Thessalonica in memory of the victory that he obtained over the Thessalians. Its old name was Therma. The Jews had a synagogue here, and their number was considerable. Acts xvii.

[Strabo and others say it was named after Thessalonica, daughter of Philip, and wife of Cassander. After the battle of Pydna, it surrendered to the Romans, and became the capital of the second region of Macedonia. When the four regions were united, it was made the metropolis of the whole. It was the scene of Cicero's exile. Antony and Octavius were there after the battle of Philippi; and there are extant coins which allude to the "freedom" granted by the victorious leaders to the city of the Thermaic Gulf. Situated half-way between the Adriatic and the Hellespont, its commercial advantages are great: it continued to be an important city until it was taken from the Venetians by the Turks, in 1431; and it is now the second city in European Turkey. It contains a population of seventy thousand or seventy-five thousand, namely, thirty-five thousand Jews, who have thirty-six synagogues; five thousand Turks, some of whose mosques were originally pagan temples, one of them, St. Sophia, being a handsome imitation of that at Constantinople; and the rest Christians, chiefly Greeks, who have some thirty churches. It is an archiepiscopal see. Its Christian history has been continuous, and the mediæval chroniclers call it "the orthodox city." Salonica, as the modern city is called, is situated on the slope of a hill, enclosed by walls five miles in circuit, and commanded by a citadel called the "Seven Towers." It has three ports near the harbor. One of its gates was erected in honor of Augustus: within the citadel is an arch erected under Marcus Aurelius; and in the centre of the city is the hippodrome, enclosing a magnificent area. The trade of the city is considerable: its exports are chiefly silk, wool, wine, grain, and tobacco.]

THIEF. Among the Hebrews, theft was not punished with death: "Men do not despise a thief if he steal to satisfy his soul when he is hungry. But if he be found, he shall restore seven-fold; he shall give all the substance of his house." Prov. vi. 30, 31. The law allowed the killing of a night-robber, because it was supposed his intention was to murder as well as to rob. Exod. xxii. 2. It condemned a common thief to make double restitution. Exod. xxii. 4. If he stole an ox, he was to restore it five-fold: if a sheep, only four-fold. Exod. xxii. 1: 2 Sam. xii. 6. But if the animal that was stolen was found alive in his house, he only rendered the double of it. If he did not make restitution, they seized what was in his house, put it up to sale, and even sold the person himself if he had not wherewithal to make satisfaction. Exod. xxii. 3.

THOMAS, the Apostle, otherwise called Didymus, which in Greek signifies a twin. Matt. x. 3: Luke vi. 15. We know no particulars of his life till A. D. 83. John xi. 16; xiv. 5, 6; xx. 24-29; xxi. 1-13. Ancient tradition says, that in the distribution which the apostles made of the several parts of the world, wherein they were to preach the gospel, the country of the Parthians fell to the share of St. Thomas. It is added, that he preached to the Medes, Persians, Carmanians, Hyrcanians, Bactrians, etc. Several of the fathers inform us that he also preached in the East Indies, etc.

[THOMAS ST., CHRISTIANS OF. See CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS.]

[THOMISTS. Followers of Thomas Aquinas, a descendant of the counts of Aquino, where he was born, A. D. 1224. He was educated at the University of Naples. At seventeen, contrary to the wishes of his mother, he joined the Dominicans, and at twenty-four taught dialectics, philosophy, and theology, in the University of Paris. He lectured on divinity in other universities, and settled at Naples, the archbishopric of which city he refused. He died in 1274, and was canonized in 1323. His works make seventeen volumes, of which the most celebrated is the Summa Theologiae. He held the Aristotelian philosophy and the dogmas of Augustin on original sin, etc., condemned the notion of the immaculate conception of the Virgin, held by Scotus, and taught that the sacraments confer grace physically, whereas Scotus taught that they do it morally. Aquinas is called the Angelical Doctor, the Fifth Doctor, the Eagle of the Church, and the Angel of the Schools.]

THORN, a general name for several kinds of prickly plants. 1. In the curse denounced against the earth, Gen. iii. 18, its produce is threatened to be "thorns and thistles" קִצְוֹת וְקַלְבַּשִׁים, in the Septuagint ἀκάνθας καὶ τριβόλους. St. Paul uses the same words, Heb. vi. 8, where the last is rendered "briers;" they are also found Hos. x. 8. The word kutz is put for "thorns," in other places, as Exod. xxii. 6: Judges viii. 7: Ezek. ii. 6; xxviii. 24; but we are uncertain whether it means a specific kind of thorn, or may be a generic name for all plants of a thorny kind. In the present instance it seems to be general for all those obnoxious plants, shrubs, etc., by which the labors of the husbandman are impeded, and which are only fit for burning. If the word denotes a particular plant, it may be the "rest-harrow," a pernicious prickly weed, which grows promiscuously with the large thistles in the uncultivated grounds, and covers entire fields and plains, in Egypt and Palestine. From the resemblance of the Hebrew dardar to the Arabic word dardargi, Scheuchzer supposes the cinus to be intended. 2. קִצְוֹת, [Prov. xxvi. 9,] from its etymology, must be a kind of thorn, with incurved spines, like fish-hooks, similar to those of the North American "witch hazel." Celsius says that the same word, and of the same original in Arabic, is the "black thorn," or "sloe tree," the prunus spinosa of Linnæus. 3. סִרְיִים. It is impossible to determine what plants are intended by this word. Meninski says that serbin, in the Persic language, is the name of a tree bearing thorns. In Eccles. vii. 6, and Nahum i. 10, they are mentioned as fuel which quickly burns up; and in Hosea ii. 6, as obstructions or hedges; it may be the lycium Afrum. 4. סִלְקִים, mentioned Josh. xxiii. 13: Ezek. ii. 6; xxviii. 24. From the vexatious character ascribed to this thorn in the places just referred to, compared with Num. xxxiii. 55: Judges ii. 3, it is probably the kantuffa, as described by Bruce. 5. By יָדִים, Num. xxxiii. 55, may be intended goads, or sharp-pointed sticks, like those with which cattle were driven. 6. The שִׁיר, Isa. v. 6; x. 17, must mean some noxious plant that overruns waste grounds. 7. The word קִצְוֹת, Num. xxxiii. 55: Josh. xxiii.

13: Isa. v. 5, seems, from its application, to describe a bad kind of thorn. Hiller supposes it to be the vepres. Perhaps it is the rhamnus paliurus, a deciduous plant or tree, a native of Palestine, Spain, and Italy. It will grow nearly to the height of fourteen feet, and is armed with sharp thorns, two of which are at the insertion of each branch, one of them straight and upright, the other bent backward. 8. בְּרָקִים, translated "briers," Judges viii. 16. There is no doubt this word means a sharp, jagged kind of plant: the difficulty is to fix on one, where so many offer themselves. The Septuagint preserves the original word. We should hardly think Gideon went far to seek these plants. The thorns are expressly said to be from the wilderness, or common, hard by; probably the barkanim were from the same place. In our country this would lead us to the blackberry bushes on our commons; but it might not be so around Succoth. There is a plant mentioned by Hasselquist, whose name and properties somewhat resemble those which are required in the barkanim of this passage: "Nabka paliurus Athenæi, is the nabka of the Arabs. There is every appearance that this is the tree which furnished the crown of thorns which was put on the head of our Lord. It is common in the east. A plant more proper for this purpose could not be selected; for it is armed with thorns, its branches are pliant, and its leaf of a deep green, like that of ivy. Perhaps the enemies of Christ chose this plant in order to add insult to injury, by employing a wreath approaching in appearance that which was used to crown emperors and generals." In the New Testament, the Greek word translated "thorn," is ἄκανθα: Matt. vii. 16; xiii. 7; xxvii. 29: John xix. 2. The note of Bishop Pearce on Matt. xxvii. 29 is this: "The word ἄκανθων may as well be the plural genitive case of the word ἄκανθος, as of ἄκανθα: if of the latter, it is rightly translated 'of thorns,' but the former would signify what we call 'bear's foot,' and the French, branche ursine. This is not of the thorny kind of plants, but is soft and smooth. Virgil calls it mollis acanthus. So does Pliny; and Pliny the elder says that it is lævis, 'smooth;' and that it is one of those plants that are cultivated in gardens. I have somewhere read, but cannot at present recollect where, that this soft and smooth herb was very common in and about Jerusalem. I find nothing in the New Testament concerning this crown which Pilate's soldiers put on the head of Jesus, to incline one to think that it was of thorns, and intended, as is usually supposed, to put him to pain. The reed put into his hand, and the scarlet robe on his back, were meant only as marks of mockery and contempt. One may also reasonably judge by the soldiers being said to plat this crown, that it was not composed of such twigs and leaves as were of a thorny nature. I do not find that it is mentioned by any of the primitive Christian writers as an instance of the cruelty used toward our Saviour before he was led to crucifixion, till the time of Tertullian, who lived after Jesus' death at the distance of above one hundred and sixty years. He indeed seems to have understood ἄκανθων in the sense of thorns, and says, 'Quale oro te, Jesus Christus sertum pro utroque sexu subiti? Ex spinis, opinor, et tribulis.' [What kind of a crown, I pray you, did Jesus Christ sustain? One made of thorns and thistles, I think.] The total silence of Polycarp, Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, and all the other Christian writers whose works are now extant, and who wrote before Tertullian, in particular, will give some weight to incline one to think that this crown was not platted with thorns. But as this is a point on which we have not sufficient evidence, I leave it almost in the same state of uncertainty in which I found it." See GARDEN.

THRESHING-FLOORS, among the ancient Jews, were only, as they are to this day in the east, round level plats of ground in the open air, where the corn was trodden out by oxen, the libyæ areæ of Horace. Thus, Gideon's floor, Judges vi. 37, appears to have been in the open air; as was likewise that of Araunah the Jebusite; else it would not have been a proper place for erecting an altar and offering sacrifice. In Hosea xiii. 3, we read of the chaff which is driven by the whirlwind from the floor. This circumstance of the threshing-floor's being exposed to the agitation of the wind, seems to be the principal reason of its Hebrew name; which may be further illustrated by the direction which Hesiod gives his husbandman, to thresh his corn in a place well exposed to the wind. From the above account it appears that a threshing-floor (rendered in our textual translation "a void place") might well be near the entrance of the gate of Samaria, and that it might afford no improper place in which the kings of Israel and Judah could hear the prophets. 1 Kings xxii. 10: 2 Chron. xviii. 9: Psalm i. 4. [Isaiah (xli. 15, 16) speaks of a "sharp threshing instrument having teeth;" which appears to have been a heavy square frame with rollers, encircled by serrated iron rings: it was drawn over the wheat, etc., by oxen, the driver sitting on it. From its shape, it is called a "cart," Isa. xxviii. 27, 28.]

THRONE is used for that magnificent seat on which sovereign princes usually sit to receive the homage of their subjects, or to give audience to ambassadors; where they appear with pomp and ceremony, and from whence they dispense justice; in a word, the throne, the sceptre, the crown, are the ordinary symbols of royalty and regal authority. The Scripture commonly represents the Lord as sitting upon a throne; sometimes it is said that the heaven is his throne, and the earth his footstool. Isaiah lxvi. 1. The Son of God is also represented as sitting upon a throne, at the right hand of his Father. Psalm cx. 1: Heb. i. 8: Rev. iii. 21. And Jesus Christ assures his apostles that they should sit upon twelve thrones, to judge the twelve tribes of Israel. Luke xxii. 30. Though a throne and royal dignity seem to be correlatives, or terms that stand in reciprocal relation to each other, yet the privilege of sitting on a throne has been sometimes granted to those that were not kings, particularly to some governors of important provinces. We read of the throne of the governor of this side the river; the throne, in other words, of the governor for the King of Persia of the provinces belonging to that empire on the west of the Euphrates. [Neh. iii. 7.] So D'Herbelot tells us that a Persian monarch of after-times gave the governor of one of his provinces permission to seat himself in a gilded chair, when he administered justice; which distinction was granted him on account of the importance of that post, to which the guarding a pass of great consequence was committed. This province, he tells us, is now called Shirvan, but was formerly named Serir-aldhahab, which signifies in Arabic, "the throne of gold." To which he adds, that this privilege was granted to the governor of this province, as being the place through which the northern nations used to make their way into Persia; on which account, also, a mighty rampart or wall was raised there.

In the Revelation of St. John, we find the twenty-four elders sitting upon as many thrones in the presence of the Lord; "and they fall down before him that sat on the throne, etc., and cast their crowns before the throne." Many of the travellers in eastern countries have given descriptions highly illustrative of this mode of adoration. Thus Bruce, in his Travels, says, "The next remarkable ceremony in which these two nations (of Persia and Abyssinia) agreed is that of adoration, inviolably observed in Abyssinia to this day, as often as you enter the sovereign's presence. This is not only kneeling, but absolute prostration: you first fall upon your knees, then upon the palms of your hands, then incline your head and body till your forehead touches the ground; and, in case you have an answer to expect, you lie in that posture till the king, or somebody from him, desires you to rise." And Stewart observes, "We marched toward the emperor with our music playing, till we came within about eighty yards of him, when the old monarch, alighting from his horse, prostrated himself on the earth to pray, and continued some minutes with his face so close to the earth, that when we came up to him, the dust remained upon his nose."

The circumstance of "casting their crowns before the throne" may be illustrated by several cases which occur in history. That of Herod, in the presence of Augustus, has been already mentioned. (See HEROD.) Tiridates, in this manner, did homage to Nero, laying the ensigns of his royalty at the statue of Cæsar, to receive them again from his hand. Tigranes, King of Armenia, did the same to Pompey. In the inauguration of the Byzantine Cæsars, when the emperor comes to receive the sacrament, he puts off his crown. "This short expedition," says Malcolm, "was brought to a close by the personal submission of Aboul Fyze Khan, who, attended by all his court, proceeded to the tents of Nadir Shah, and laid his crown, and other ensigns of royalty, at the feet of the conqueror, who assigned him an honorable place in his assembly, and in a few days afterward restored him to his throne."

[THUMMIM. See URIM AND THUMMIM.]

[THUNDERING LEGION. See LEGION, THUNDERING.]

[THURIFICATI. Those who, during the pagan persecutions, offered incense on altars dedicated to idols, in order to escape death. See LAPSED.]

THYATIRA, a city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, and the seat of one of the seven churches in Asia. It was situated nearly midway between Pergamos and Sardis, and is still a tolerable town, considering that it is in the hands of the Turks, and enjoys some trade, chiefly in cottons. It is called by that people Ak-hissar, or White Castle. [It is about twenty-seven miles north-west of Sardis, on a plain, near a branch of the Caicus. Dr. Durbin, who visited it a few years since, says it "contains about twelve hundred houses, of which four hundred belong to the Greeks, thirty or forty to Armenians, and the remainder to the Turks. There was an unusual profusion of broken marbles lying in the streets, worked into the mud walls of the houses, or used in the construction of mosques and baths, and in adorning the cemeteries. Along many streets flowed an abundance of most delicious soft water, which, since the days of 'Lydia, a seller of purple of the city of Thyatira,' Acts xvi. 14, has been celebrated for its excellence in the process of dyeing." An inscription in honor of Antonius Claudius Alphenus, by the corporation of dyers of this city, ending with ο βαφεύς, the dyers, has been lately discovered. Scarlet cloths are sent to Smyrna from Ak-hissar, it being on the great thoroughfare between that city and Constantinople. The Christians of Thyatira are in a deplorable state of ignorance and superstition.]

[THYINE WOOD. Rev. xviii. 12. This word comes from θύα, to sacrifice or burn incense, and is applied to the citron tree because of its fragrance. It was much used on Greek altars, and also for furniture, etc., as, on account of its resinous property, it is not infested by insects, and but little liable to decay. It is a species of arbor vitæ, called callitris quadrivalvis, and by Linnæus, thuja articulata. It is a native of Mount Atlas, and other hills of Africa, where it grows to a large size.]

[TIARA. The pope's triple crown. The first tiara was round and high: John XIII. encompassed it with a crown; Boniface VIII. added a second, and Benedict XII. a third. It represents the pope's temporal dignity.]

TIBERIAS, a city situated in a small plain, surrounded by mountains, on the western coast of the Sea of Galilee, which, from this city, was also called the Sea of Tiberias. Tiberias was erected by Herod Antipas, and so called in honor of Tiberius Cæsar. He is supposed to have chosen, for the erection of his new city, a spot where before stood a more obscure place, called Chenereth or Cinnereth, which also gave its name to the adjoining lake or sea.

[Tubariyeh, as the Arabs call it, was visited in 1840 by Dr. Olin, who gives a minute description of it. One of those earthquakes with which it has been frequently visited took place in 1837, when nearly one-third of its three thousand inhabitants perished, and most of its buildings were demolished, including all the mosques, except one, the castle at the north-west angle of the town, and the walls. These were about twenty-five feet high, with twenty-two towers, two of which were at the termini of the north and south walls. It was thus fortified on three sides, the sea being in front. The west side is a third of a mile long; the north and south about an eighth. Old Tiberias extended farther to the south. On the top of a spur of the mountain which extends to the south-west angle of the old wall are ruins of a citadel. The old city was fortified on the water side, and a massive remnant of the ancient bulwark, one hundred paces long, with a round tower, is seen at the south-east. Other ruins are scattered on the ground and in the edge of the water. As Jerusalem and Hebron are the two holy cities of the Jews in Judea, so Tiberias and Safed are their two holy cities in Galilee. After the destruction of Jerusalem they resorted to Tiberias, where they established a famous school in the second century, and to the present time it is resorted to for the study of rabbinical learning. Dr. Olin gives no very flattering description of the two schools he saw there. He says, "There are in Tiberias about two hundred Jews—males, I suppose. Formerly there were many more, who perished in the earthquake, or have since dispersed. The residue hold in their hands nearly all of the pitiful trade which exists in this most wretched of all the towns I have ever seen. Judging from the aspect of the inhabitants, the climate must be desperately malignant. So indeed the rabbi told us it was, and that the place would soon be forsaken, but that it is one of the holy cities. I learned, from the same authority, that here are a hundred Christians, which I presume to be the number of men: they are Greek Catholics. They show to the traveller the house of St. Peter, which has no claim to the antiquity assigned it, being rather Saracen than Greek in its architecture, though in reality it is neither one nor the other." The monks visit it on St. Peter's day; at other times it is occupied by the resident Christians. It is about thirty feet by twenty feet, and is furnished with a kind of pulpit and altar. See GENESARET and HAMMATH.]

[TIBERIUS. The third emperor of Rome. Luke iii. 1; xxiii. 2. He was a cruel despot, and was put to death by suffocation with bolsters.]

[TIBNI. A rival of Omri. 1 Kings xvi. 21, 22.]

[TIDAL. Gen. xiv. 1, 9. A chief of several clans; unless, as Dathe, Michaelis, and others think, גויים, Goyim, is a proper name.]

[TIGLATH-PILESER, TILGATH-PILNERSER. A king of Assyria, who conquered Israel. 2 Kings xv. 29: 1 Chron. v. 26. His portrait and annals, corroborating the Scripture history, have been found at Nineveh.]

TIMBRELS. See MUSIC.

[TIMNA. Concubine of Eliphaz, and mother of Amalek. Gen. xxxvi. 12.—Also, one of the sons of Eliphaz. Gen. xxxvi. 40: 1 Chron. i. 36.]

[TIMNATH. A town in Dan, where Samson married; Judges xiv.: called Timna, Josh. xv. 10, and Thimnathah, Josh. xix. 43. Robinson identifies it with Tibneh, some twenty miles west of Jerusalem.—There was a Timna, or Timnath, in the mountains of Judah. Gen. xxxviii. 12–14: Josh. xv. 57; and a Timnah, or Thamna, north-east of Lydda, which gave name to the "Toparchia Thammitica," probably the Timnah fortified by Bacchides. 1 Macc. ix. 50.]

[TIMNATH-SERAH. Joshua's city in Mount Ephraim. Josh. xix. 50; xxiv. 30. It means, according to some, abundant portion. In some MSS. of Judges ii. 9, it is called Timnath-heres, the portion of the sun.]

TIMOTHEUS, commonly called Timothy, a disciple of St. Paul. He was a native of Lystra in Lycaonia. His father was a Gentile; but his mother, whose name was Eunice, was a Jewess, Acts' xvi. 1, and educated her son with great care in her own religion.—2 Tim. i. 5; iii. 15. To this young disciple St. Paul addressed two Epistles; in the first of which he calls him his "own son in the faith," 1 Tim. i. 2; from which expression it is inferred that St. Paul was the person who converted him to the belief of the gospel; and as, upon St. Paul's second arrival at Lystra, Timothy is mentioned as being then a disciple, and as having distinguished himself among the Christians of that neighborhood, his conversion, as well as that of Eunice his mother, and Lois his grandmother, must have taken place when St. Paul first preached at Lystra, A. D. 46. Upon St. Paul's leaving Lystra, in the course of his second apostolical journey, he was induced to take Timothy with him, on account of his excellent character, and the zeal which, young as he was, he had already shown in the cause of Christianity; but before they set out, St. Paul caused him to be circumcised, not as a thing necessary to his salvation, but to avoid giving offence to the Jews, as he was a Jew by the mother's side, and it was an established rule among the Jews that partus sequitur ventrem. Timothy was regularly appointed to the ministerial office by the laying on of hands, not only by St. Paul himself, but also by the presbytery. 1 Tim. iv. 14: 2 Tim. i. 6. From this time Timothy acted as a minister of the gospel; he generally attended St. Paul, but was sometimes employed by him in other places; he was very diligent and useful, and is always mentioned with great esteem and affection by St. Paul, who joins his name with his own in the inscription of six of his Epistles. He is sometimes called Bishop of Ephesus, and it has been said that he suffered martyrdom in that city, some years after the death of St. Paul.

The principal design of St. Paul's First Epistle to Timothy was to give him instructions concerning the management of the Church of Ephesus; and it was probably intended that it should be read publicly to the Ephesians, that they might know upon what authority Timothy acted. After saluting him in an affectionate manner, and reminding him of the reason for which he was left at Ephesus, the apostle takes occasion, from the frivolous disputes which some Judaizing teachers had introduced among the Ephesians, to assert the practical nature of the gospel, and to show its superiority over the law; he returns thanks to God for his own appointment to the apostleship, and recommends to Timothy fidelity in the discharge of his sacred office; he exhorts that prayers should be made for all men, and especially for magistrates; he gives directions for the conduct of women, and forbids their teaching in public; he describes the qualifications necessary for bishops and deacons, and speaks of the mysterious nature of the gospel dispensation; he foretells that there will be apostates from the truth, and false teachers in the latter times, and recommends to Timothy purity of manners and improvement of his spiritual gifts; he gives him particular directions for his behavior toward persons in different situations in life, and instructs him in several points of Christian discipline; he cautions him against false teachers, gives him several precepts, and solemnly charges him to be faithful to his trust.

That the Second Epistle to Timothy was written while St. Paul was under confinement at Rome, appears from the two following passages: "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner." 2 Tim. i. 8. "The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; but when he was at Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me." 2 Tim. i. 16, 17. The Epistle itself will furnish us with several arguments to prove that it could not have been written during St. Paul's first imprisonment. 1. It is universally agreed that St. Paul wrote his Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and to Philemon, while he was confined the first time at Rome. In no one of these Epistles does he express any apprehension for his life; and in the last two mentioned we have seen that, on the contrary, he expresses a confident hope of being soon liberated; but in this Epistle he holds a very different language: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." 2 Tim. iv. 6, etc. The danger in which St. Paul now was, is evident from the conduct of his friends, when he made his defence: "At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me." 2 Tim. iv. 16. This expectation of death, and this imminent danger, cannot be reconciled either with the general tenor of his Epistles written during his first confinement at Rome, with the nature of the charge laid against him when he was carried thither from Jerusalem, or with St. Luke's account of his confinement there; for we must remember that in A. D. 63, Nero had not begun to persecute the Christians; that none of the Roman magistrates and officers who heard the accusations against St. Paul at Jerusalem thought that he had committed any offence against the Roman government; that at Rome St. Paul was completely out of the power of the Jews; and, so little was he there considered as having been guilty of any capital crime, that he was suffered to dwell "two whole years," that is, the whole time of his confinement, "in his own hired house, and to receive all that came in unto him, preaching the word of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ with all confidence, no man forbidding him." Acts xxviii. 30, 31. 2. From the inscriptions of the Epistles to the Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon, it is certain that Timothy was with St. Paul in his first imprisonment at Rome; but this Epistle implies that Timothy was absent. 3. St. Paul tells the Colossians that Mark salutes them, and therefore he was at Rome with St. Paul in his first imprisonment; but he was not at Rome when this Epistle was written, for Timothy is directed to bring him with him. 2 Tim. iv. 11. 4. Demas, also, was with St. Paul when he wrote to the Colossians: "Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you." Col. iv. 14. In this Epistle he says, "Demas has forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed into Thessalonica." 2 Tim. iv. 10. It may be said that this Epistle might have been written before the others, and that in the intermediate time Timothy and Mark might have come to Rome, more especially as St. Paul desires Timothy to come shortly, and bring Mark with him. But this hypothesis is not consistent with what is said of Demas, who was with St. Paul when he wrote to the Colossians, and had left him when he wrote this second Epistle to Timothy; consequently, the Epistle to Timothy must be posterior to that addressed to the Colossians. The case of Demas seems to have been, that he continued faithful to St. Paul during his first imprisonment, which was attended with little or no danger; but deserted him in the second, when Nero was persecuting the Christians, and St. Paul evidently considered himself in great danger. 5. St. Paul tells Timothy, "Erastus abode at Corinth, but Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick." 2 Tim. iv. 20. These were plainly two circumstances which had happened in some journey which St. Paul had taken not long before he wrote this Epistle, and since he and Timothy had seen each other; but the last time St. Paul was at Corinth and Miletum, prior to his first imprisonment at Rome, Timothy was with him at both places; and Trophimus could not have been then left at Miletum, for we find him at Jerusalem immediately after St. Paul's arrival in that city: "For they had seen before with him in the city Trophimus, an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple." Acts xxi. 29. These two facts must therefore refer to some journey subsequent to the first imprisonment; and, consequently, this Epistle was written during St. Paul's second imprisonment at Rome, and probably in A. D. 65, not long before his death. It is by no means certain where Timothy was when this Epistle was written to him. It seems most probable that he was somewhere in Asia Minor, since St. Paul desires him to bring the cloak with him which he had left at Troas, 2 Tim. iv. 13; and also, at the end of the first chapter, he speaks of several persons whose residence was in Asia. Many have thought that he was at Ephesus; but others have rejected that opinion, because Troas does not lie in the way from Ephesus to Rome, whither he was directed to go as quickly as he could. St. Paul, after his usual salutation, assures Timothy of his most affectionate remembrance; he speaks of his own apostleship and of his sufferings; exhorts Timothy to be steadfast in the true faith, to be constant and diligent in the discharge of his ministerial office, to avoid foolish and unlearned questions, and to practice and inculcate the great duties of the gospel; he describes the apostasy and general wickedness of the last days, and highly commends the Holy Scriptures; he again solemnly exhorts Timothy to diligence; speaks of his own danger, and of his hope of future reward; and concludes with several private directions, and with salutations.

TIN, תִּינ, Num. xxxi. 22: Isa. i. 25: Ezek. xxii. 18, 20; xxvii. 12: a well-known coarse metal, harder than lead. Mr. Parkhurst observes that Moses, in Num. xxxi. 22, enumerates all the six species of metals. The Lord, by the prophet Isaiah, having compared the Jewish people to silver, declares, "I will turn my hand upon thee, and purge away thy dross, and remove all תִּינִים, thy particles of tin;" where Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion have κασι-τερον σου, and the Vulgate stannum tuum, "thy tin;" but the LXX., ἀνόμους, wicked ones. This denunciation, by a comparison of the preceding and the following context, appears to signify that God would, by a process of judgment, purify those among the Jews who were capable of purification, as well as destroy the reprobate and incorrigible. Jer. vi. 29, 30; ix. 7: Mal. iii. 3: Ezek. xii. 18, 20. In Ezek. xxvii. 12, Tarshish is mentioned as furnishing תִּינִים, and Bochart proves from the testimonies of Diodorus, Pliny, and Stephanus, that Tartessus, in Spain, which he supposes the ancient Tarshish, anciently furnished tin. As Cornwall in very ancient times was resorted to for this metal, and probably first by the Phenicians, some have thought that peninsula to be the Tarshish of the Scriptures; a subject which, however, from the vague use of the word, is involved in much uncertainty. See TARSHISH.

[TIPHSARH]. 1 Kings iv. 24. This word, meaning passage, was the name of a city and ford of the Euphrates, called Thapsacus by the Greeks. Xenophon says, the river is there four stadia in breadth, and that, in crossing it, no one of the army of Cyrus was wetted above the breast. The people of Thapsacus said that it had never before been passable on foot, but only in boats, which Abrocomas had burned. The historian refers its fording by Cyrus to "Divine interposition." Alexander crossed it at that point on a bridge. On both sides of the river are to be seen the remains of a paved causeway marked in the Augustan and Theodosian Tables as part of a road running by Palmyra to Babylon, and northward to Carrhæ, Edessa, and other places. Solomon took possession of it, in connection with the building of Tadmor, or Palmyra, to secure the great eastern trade. It is called Sura by Pliny and Ptolemy, and in the ecclesiastical notices of the Lower Empire, Flavia firma Sura. Stephanus says it was called Tarmeda by the Syrians. Seleucus Nicator called it Amphipolis. Its ruins, which consist of mounds, are now called Suriyah. It is nearly opposite Raeca, and not, as some say, at Dair, which is two hundred and eleven miles by the river from Balis, whereas Xenophon says Thapsacus was only fifteen parasangs, or forty-five miles, which corresponds with the overland distance from Belas to Suriyah, or "the ford of the Badawin," as it is called by the Arabs.]

[TIRES] תִּירֵס: Μηρίακοι, LXX.: Lu-

nulæ, Vulgate. Little moons. Crescent-formed ornaments worn round their necks by camels, Judg. viii. 21, 26, and by women, Isa. iii. 18.]

[TIRHAKAH]. 2 Kings xix. 9. A king of Egypt, of the Ethiopian dynasty, the twenty-fifth. His successes against Assyria are recorded on a monument at Thebes. Megarthenes says he pushed his conquests to the Pillars of Hercules.]

[TIRSHATHA]. A title, supposed to mean censor, or governor. Ezra ii. 63: Neh. vii. 65, 70; viii. 9; x. 1. Some derive it from a Persic word meaning austere.]

[TIRZAH]. A Canaanite city, which Jero-boam made his capital. Josh. xii. 24: 1 Kings xiv. 17. Robinson identifies it with Tullûzah, "a town of some size, and tolerably well built; the place which Brocardus speaks of as Thersa, three leagues east of Samaria." Tirzah means delightful. Cant. vi. 4.]

[TISHBITE]. 1 Kings xvii. 1. Josephus says Elijah was "of Thesbon, a country in Gilead." Tobit (i. 2) locates "Thisbe at the right hand of that city which is called properly Nephthali, in Galilee, above Aser."]

TITHES. We have nothing more ancient concerning tithes than what we find in Gen. xiv. 20, that Abraham gave tithes to Melchizedek, King of Salem, at his return from his expedition against Chedorlaomer, and the four kings in confederacy with him. Abraham gave him tithe of all the booty he had taken from the enemy. Jacob imitated this piety of his grandfather, when he vowed to the Lord the tithe of all the substance he might acquire in Mesopotamia. Gen. xxvii. 22. Under the law, Moses ordained, "All the tithe of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree, is the Lord's: it is holy unto the Lord. And if a man will at all redeem ought of his tithes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof. And concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord." Lev. xxvii. 30-32. The Pharisees, in the time of Jesus Christ, to distinguish themselves by a more scrupulous observance of the law, did not content themselves with paying the tithe of the grain and fruits growing in the fields; but they also paid tithe of the pulse and herbs growing in their gardens, which was more than the law required of them. The tithes were taken from what remained, after the offerings and first-fruits were paid. They brought the tithes to the Levites in the city of Jerusalem, as appears from Josephus and Tobit, i. 6. The Levites set apart the tenth part of their tithes for the priest; because the priest did not receive them immediately from the people, and the Levites were not to meddle with the tithes they had received, before they had given the priests such a part as the law assigned them. Of those nine parts that remained to the proprietors, after the tithe was paid to the Levites, they took still another tenth part, which was either sent to Jerusalem in kind, or, if it were too far, they sent the value in money; adding to it a fifth from the whole, as the rabbins inform us. This tenth part was applied toward celebrating the festivals in the temple, which bore a near resemblance to the agapa, or love-feasts of the first Christians. Thus are those words of Deuteronomy understood by the rabbins: "Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year. And thou shalt eat before the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tithe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thy oil, and of the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks; that thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always." Deut. xiv. 22, 23. Tobit (i. 6) says, that every three years he punctually paid his tithe to strangers and proselytes. This was probably because there were neither priests nor Levites in the city where he dwelt. Moses speaks of this last kind of tithe: "At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates. And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest." Deut. xiv. 28; xxvi. 12. It is thought that this tithe was not different from the second kind before noticed, except that in the third year it was not brought to the temple, but was used upon the spot by every one in the city of his habitation. So, properly speaking, there were only two sorts of tithes, that which was given to the Levites and priests, and that which was applied to making feasts of charity, either in the temple of Jerusalem, or in other cities. Samuel tells the children of Israel, that the king they had a mind to have over them would "take the tenth of their seed, and of their vineyards, and give to his officers, and his servants. He will take the tenth of your sheep, and ye shall be his servants." 1 Sam. viii. 15, 17. Yet it does not clearly appear from the history of the Jews that they regularly paid any tithe to their princes. But the manner in which Samuel expresses himself, seems to insinuate that it was looked upon as a common right among the kings of the east. At this day, the Jews no longer pay any tithe; at least, they do not think themselves obliged to do it, except it be those who are settled in the territory of Jerusalem, and the ancient Judea. For there are few Jews now that have any lands of their own, or any flocks. They only give something for the redemption of the first-born, to those who have any proofs of their being descended from the race of the priests or Levites. However, we are assured that such among the Jews as would be thought to be very strict and religious, give the tenth part of their whole income to the poor.

[The tithe system was brought into the Church in the fourth or fifth century. At the end of the sixth century the payment of tithes was enforced in some countries under pain of excommunication. Charlemagne is supposed to be the first who made it compulsory by civil law. He paid tithes for his private property and Saxon possessions. His successors carried out the system, which was afterward transferred to England. In some provinces, tithes were divided into three parts: one-third went to the bishop, as he had to entertain travellers, etc.; another part went to the other clergy; and the third went to the poor and the repairing of churches. In England, as far back as before the time of Edward the Confessor, tithes were no longer paid to the bishop, but directly to the parish priests. Tithes are personal, when accruing from labor, art, trade, and navigation; predial, when from the earth, as hay, wood, and fruit; mixed, when from beasts which are fed from the ground.]

[TITTLE. The kepaíta, Matt. v. 18, refers to the corners which distinguish similar letters in the Hebrew alphabet, as 7 and 7. It figuratively denotes any thing very small.]

TITUS. It is remarkable that Titus is not mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. The few particulars which are known of him are collected from the Epistles of St. Paul. We learn from them that he was a Greek, Gal. ii. 3; but it is not recorded to what city or country he belonged. From St. Paul's calling him "his own son according to the common faith," Titus i. 4, it is concluded that he was converted by him; but we have no account of the time or place of his conversion. He is first mentioned as going from Antioch to the council at Jerusalem, A. D. 49, Gal. ii. 1, etc.; and upon that occasion St. Paul says that he would not allow him to be circumcised, because he was born of Gentile parents. He probably accompanied St. Paul in his second apostolical journey, and from that time he seems to have been constantly employed by him in the propagation of the gospel: he calls him his partner and fellow-helper, 2 Cor. viii. 23. St. Paul sent him from Ephesus with his First Epistle to the Corinthians, and with a commission to inquire into the state of the Church at Corinth; and he sent him thither again from Macedonia with his second Epistle, and to forward the collections for the saints in Judea. From this time we hear nothing of Titus till he was left by St. Paul in Crete, after his first imprisonment at Rome, to "set in order the things that were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city." Titus i. 5. It is probable that he went thence to join St. Paul at Nicopolis, Titus iii. 12; that they went together to Crete to visit the churches there, and thence to Rome. During St. Paul's second imprisonment at Rome, Titus went into Dalmatia, 2 Tim. iv. 10; and after the apostle's death, he is said to have returned into Crete, and to have died there in the ninety-fourth year of his age: he is often called Bishop of Crete by ecclesiastical writers. St. Paul always speaks of Titus in terms of high regard, and intrusted him, as we have seen, with commissions of great importance. It is by no means certain from what place St. Paul wrote this Epistle; but as he desires Titus to come to him at Nicopolis, and declares his intention of passing the winter there, some have supposed that, when he wrote it, he was in the neighborhood of that city, either in Greece or Macedonia; others have imagined that he wrote it from Colosse, but it is difficult to say upon what ground. As it appears that St. Paul, not long before he wrote this Epistle, had left Titus in Crete for the purpose of regulating the affairs of the Church, and at the time he wrote it had determined to pass the approaching winter at Nicopolis, and as the Acts of the Apostles do not give any account of St. Paul's preaching in that island, or of visiting that city, it is concluded that this Epistle was written after his first imprisonment at Rome, and probably in A. D. 64. It may be considered as some confirmation of that opinion, that there is a great similarity between the sentiments and expressions of this Epistle and of the First Epistle to Timothy, which was written in that year. It is not known at what time a Christian Church was first planted in Crete; but as some Cretans were present at the first effusion of the Holy Ghost at Jerusalem, Acts ii. 11, it is not improbable that, upon their return home, they might be the means of introducing the gospel among their countrymen. Crete is said to have abounded with Jews; and from the latter part of the first chapter of this Epistle it appears that many of them were persons of very profligate lives, even after they had embraced the gospel. The principal design of this Epistle was to give instructions to Titus concerning the management of the Churches in the different cities of the island of Crete, and it was probably intended to be read publicly to the Cretans, that they might know upon what authority Titus acted. St. Paul, after his usual salutation, intimates that he was appointed an apostle by the express command of God, and reminds Titus of the reason of his being left in Crete; he describes the qualifications necessary for bishops, and cautions him against persons of bad principles, especially Judaizing teachers, whom he directs Titus to reprove with severity; he informs him what instructions he should give to people in different situations of life, and exhorts him to be exemplary in his own conduct; he points out the pure and practical nature of the gospel, and enumerates some particular virtues which he was to inculcate, avoiding foolish questions and frivolous disputes; he instructs him how he is to behave toward heretics; and concludes with salutations.

TIZRI, or TISRI, the first Hebrew month of the civil year, and the seventh of the sacred year, answering to the moon of September. On the first day of this month was kept the feast of trumpets, because the beginning of the civil year was proclaimed with the sound of trumpets. [It is called Ethanim, 1 Kings viii. 2.]

TOB, a country of Palestine, lying beyond Jordan, in the northern part of the portion of Manasseh. To this district Jephthah retired, when he was driven away by his brethren. Judges xi. 3, 5. It is also called Tobie, or Tubin, 1 Macc. v. 13; and the inhabitants of this canton were called Tubieni. It is supposed to be the same as Ishtob, one of the small principalities of Syria, which appears, like the other little kingdoms in its neighborhood, to have been swallowed up in the kingdom of Damascus. This principality furnished twelve thousand men to the confederacy formed by the Syrians and Ammonites against David. 2 Sam. x.

TOBIAH, an Ammonite, an enemy to the Jews. He was one of those who strenuously opposed the rebuilding of the temple, after the return from the captivity of Babylon. Neh. ii. 10; iv.

3; v. 1, 12, 14. This Tobiah is called "the servant," or "slave," in some parts of Nehemiah; probably because he was of a servile condition. However, he was of great consideration in the land of the Samaritans, of which he was governor with Sanballat. This Tobiah married the daughter of Shechaniah, one of the principal Jews of Jerusalem, Neh. vi. 18, and had a powerful party in Jerusalem itself, who were opposed to that of Nehemiah. He maintained a correspondence by letter with this party against the interest of Nehemiah; (vi. 17-19,) but that prudent governor, by his wisdom and moderation, defeated all their machinations. After some time, Nehemiah was obliged to return to Babylon, subsequent to having repaired the walls of Jerusalem. Tobiah took this opportunity to come and dwell at Jerusalem; and even obtained of Eliashib, who had the care of the house of the Lord, to have an apartment in the temple. But at Nehemiah's return from Babylon, some years after, he drove Tobiah out of the courts of the temple, and threw his goods out of the holy place. Neh. xiii. 4-8. From this time the Scripture makes no further mention of Tobiah. It is probable he retired to Sanballat at Samaria.

[TOBIJAH. One of the Levites sent out to instruct the people. 2 Chron. xvii. 7, 8.—Also, one of the captivity. Zech. vi. 10.]

TOGARMAH, the third son of Gomer. Gen. x. 4. The learned are divided as to what country he peopled. Josephus and St. Jerome were of opinion that Togarmah was the father of the Phrygians; Eusebius, Theodoret, and Isidorus of Seville, that he peopled Armenia: the Chaldees and the Talmudists are for Germany. Several moderns believe that the children of Togarmah peopled Turcomania in Tartary, and Scythia. Bochart is for Cappadocia: he builds upon what is said in Ezekiel xxvii. 14, "They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs," that is, at Tyre, "with horses and horsemen and mules." He proves that Cappadocia was famous for its excellent horses and its asses. He observes, also, that certain Gauls, under the conduct of Trocmus, made a settlement at Cappadocia, and were called Trocmi, or Throgmi. The opinion, says Calmet, which places Togarmah in Scythia and Turcomania, seems to stand upon the best foundation.

TOKENS, TESSERÆ, or TICKETS, were written testimonials to character, much in use in the primitive Church. By means of letters, and of brethren who travelled about, even the most remote Churches of the Roman empire were connected together. When a Christian arrived in a strange town, he first inquired for the Church; and he was here received as a brother, and provided with every thing needful for his spiritual or corporeal sustenance. But since deceivers, spies with evil intentions, and false teachers, abused the confidence and the kindness of Christians, some measure of precaution became necessary in order to avert the many injuries which might result from this conduct. An arrangement was therefore introduced, that only such travelling Christians should be received as brethren into Churches where they were strangers, as could produce a testimonial from the bishop of the Church from which they came. They called these church-letters, which were a kind of tesserae hospitales, [tickets of hospitality,] by which the Christians of all quarters of the world were brought into connection, epistolae, or literae formatae, [formal letters,] γράμματα τετυπώμενα, because, in order to avoid forgery, they were made after a certain schema, (τυπὸς, forma,) or else, epistolae communicativae, [epistles of fellowship,] γράμματα κοινωνικά, because they contained a proof that those who brought them were in the communion of the Church, as well as that the bishops who mutually sent and received such letters were in connection together by the communion of the Church; and afterward these church-letters, epistolae clericae, were divided into different classes, according to the difference of their purposes.

[TOLERATION. The allowance of dissent from a particular Church established by law. The Act of Toleration in favor of Dissenters from the Church of England was passed in 1669. It may be seen in Neal's History of the Puritans.]

[TOMBS. See BURIAL and SEPULCHRES.]

TONGUE. This word is taken in three different senses. 1. For the material tongue, or organ of speech, James iii. 5. 2. For the tongue or language that is spoken in any country, Deut. xxviii. 49. (See LANGUAGE.) 3. For good or bad discourses, Prov. xii. 18; xvii. 20. Tongue of the sea, signifies a gulf. To gnaw the tongue, Rev. xvi. 10, is a token of fury, despair, and torment. The gift of tongues was that which God granted to the apostles and disciples assembled at Jerusalem on the day of pentecost. Acts ii. The tongue of angels, is a kind of hyperbole made use of by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiii. 1.

[TONSURE. A clerical badge formed by shaving a part of the head. It is said to have originated in the fifth century, before which time it was censured as unfit for spiritual persons, being one of the tokens of penance. The Trent Catechism says, "It is a sort of preparation for receiving orders. For as persons are prepared for baptism by exorcisms, for marriage by espousals, so also those who are dedicated to God by tonsure, are prepared, as it were, for admission into the sacrament of Order. For by tonsure is declared what manner of person he should be who desires to be imbued with holy orders." Anthony, Archbishop of Florence, says, "The shaving on the upper part of the head intimates that the clergy ought to have a mind free for the contemplation of Divine things; that over the ears, that they ought not to have dull senses, or be entangled in worldly affairs; while the circular form indicates the royal dignity which they have, and that they ought to regulate themselves and others in a virtuous manner." The circle is enlarged as the man rises in ecclesiastical rank.]

TOOTH. It was ordered by the law of retaliation, that they should give tooth for tooth. Exod. xxi. 24. The opinion that it is every man's right and duty to do himself justice, and to revenge his own injuries, is by no means eradicated from among the Afghans, a people of India, to the southward of Cashmere, and, according to a paper in the Asiatic Researches, supposed to be descended from the Jews; and the right of society even to restrain the reasonable passions of individuals, and to take the redress of wrongs and punishment of crimes into its own hands, is still very imperfectly understood; or, if it is understood, is seldom present to the thoughts of the people; for although, in most parts of their country, justice might now be obtained by other means, and though private revenge is every where preached against by the mollahs, priests, and forbidden by the government, yet it is still lawful, and even honorable, in the eyes of the people, to seek that mode of redress. The injured party is considered to be entitled to strict retaliation on the aggressor. If the offender be out of his power, he may wreak his vengeance on a relation, and, in some cases, on any man in the tribe. If no opportunity of exercising this right occurs, he may defer his revenge for years; but it is disgraceful to neglect or abandon it entirely; and it is incumbent on his relations, and sometimes on his tribe, to assist him in his retaliation. To gnash the teeth is a token of sorrow, rage, despair, Psalm xxxv. 16, etc. God breaks the teeth of the wicked, Psalm iii. 7. Cleanness of teeth denotes famine, Amos iv. 6. The wicked complain that the "fathers have eaten sour grapes, and their children's teeth are set on edge," Ezek. xviii. 2, to signify that the children have suffered for their transgressions. [Compare Prov. x. 26.]

TOPAZ, טופז, Exod. xxviii. 17; xxxix. 10: Job xxviii. 19: Ezek. xxviii. 18: τοπάσιον, Rev. xxi. 20: a precious stone of a pale dead-green, with a mixture of yellow, and sometimes of fine yellow, like gold. It is very hard, and takes a fine polish. We have the authority of the Septuagint and Josephus for ascertaining this stone. The oriental topazes are most esteemed. Those of Ethiopia were celebrated for their wonderful lustre. Job xxviii. 19.

TOPHET. It is thought that Tophet was the butchery, or place of slaughter, at Jerusalem, lying to the south of the city, in the valley of the children of Hinnom. It is also said, that a large fire was constantly kept there for burning carcases, garbage, and other filth brought thither from the city. It was the place where they burned the remains of images and false gods, etc., Isa. xxx. 33. Others think the name Tophet was given to the valley of Hinnom from the beating of drums, (the word toph signifying a drum,) which accompanied the sacrifices of infants that were offered there to the god Molech. [See HINNOM.] For the manner of performing those sacrifices in Tophet, see MOLECH.

TOWER. "The tower of the flock," or the tower of Ader. Micah iv. 8. It is said this tower was in the neighborhood of Bethlehem, Gen. xxxv. 21, and that the shepherds to whom the angels revealed the birth of our Saviour were near to this tower. Luke ii. 8, 15. Many interpreters assert that the passage of Micah in which mention is made of the tower of the flock—"And thou tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion"—is to be understood of the city of Bethlehem, out of which our Saviour was to come. Others maintain, that the prophet speaks of the city of Jerusalem, in which there was a tower of this name, through which the flocks of sheep were driven to the sheep-market.

"From the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city." 2 Kings xvii. 9. This form of speaking expresses in general all the places of the country, from the least to the greatest. The towers of the watchmen, or of the shepherds, stood alone in the midst of the plain, in which the shepherds and herdsmen who looked after the flocks, or watchmen, might lodge. King Uzziah caused several towers to be built for the shepherds in the desert, and made many cisterns there, because he had a great number of flocks. 2 Chron. xxvi. 10. The tower of the flock, and that which Isaiah (v. 2) notices, which was built in the midst of a vineyard, were of the same kind.

TOWER OF BABEL. See BABEL.

TOWER OF SHECHEM was a citadel, or fortress, standing upon a higher ground than the rest of the city, and capacious enough to contain above a thousand persons. This tower, filled with the inhabitants of Shechem, was burned by Abimelech down to the very ground, together with those who had taken refuge in it. [Judg. viii. 46-49. See MILLO.]

TRACHONITIS, Luke iii. 1. This province had Arabia Deserta to the east, Batanea to the west, Iturea to the south, and the country of Damascus to the north. It belonged rather to Arabia than Palestine; was a rocky province, and served as a shelter for thieves and depredators. [Its name comes from τραχύς, rough. It was assigned by Augustus to Herod on condition that he would bring it into a state of security.]

[TRACTARIANS. See PUSEYITES.]

TRADITION. See CABALA.

[Παράδοσις, rendered tradition, means, says Parkhurst, "a doctrine or injunction, delivered or communicated from one to another, whether Divine, 1 Cor. xi. 2: 2 Thess. ii. 15; (where it is applied to written as well as oral instructions; see Macknight;) iii. 6; or human, Matt. xv. 2, 3, 6; Gal. i. 14: Col. ii. 8. Josephus observes, 'The Pharisees have delivered to the people, by tradition from the fathers, many injunctions which are not written in the law of Moses, for which reason the sect of the Sadducees rejects them, saying, that what are written should be esteemed obligatory, but that they ought not to observe those which come by such tradition.' These words agree with what is said of the Pharisees, Mark vii. Stockius, to illustrate Matt. xv. 2, cites from the Talmud, 'The words of the Scribes are more amiable than the words of the Law; for the words of the Law are weighty and light, but the words of the Scribes are all weighty.—The words of the elders are more desirable than the words of the prophets.'" The fathers used the words παράδοσις and traditio in the sense of ordinance, precept, or instruction. Thus they speak of the tradition of the apostles, meaning their instruction, as in 2 Thess. ii. 15. Compare Luke i. 2: Acts xvi. 4: 1 Cor. xi. 2, 23; xv. 3, where the verb from which παράδοσις is derived is used in a similar sense. Origen, as rendered by Rufinus, uses the word in this sense: "The Church received from the apostles the injunction, traditionem, to give baptism to infants." Bloomfield, on 1 Cor. xi. 2, Macknight, on 2 Thess. ii. 15, and critics in general, sustain this interpretation of the word. Nothing, however, is to be observed as "the tradition of the apostles," as one of the fathers expresses it, that is not contained in their Acts and Epistles. The uncertain and fictitious traditions of Rome can constitute no part of the Rule of Faith.]

[TRADITORES. Those of the lapsed who, in time of persecution, delivered over to the heathen the church registers, copies of the Scripture, etc.]

TRANSFIGURATION OF CHRIST. This event relates to a very remarkable occurrence in the history of our Lord's life, which is recorded by three of the evangelists. Matthew xvii.: Mark ix.: Luke ix. The substance of what we learn from their accounts is, that upon a certain occasion Jesus took Peter, James, and John into a high mountain, apart from all other society, and that he was there transfigured before them; his face shining as the sun, and his raiment white as the light; that, moreover, there appeared unto them Moses and Elias conversing with him; and that while they spake together on the subject of his death, which was soon afterward to take place at Jerusalem, a bright cloud overshadowed them, and a voice out of the cloud proclaimed, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The Apostle Peter, adverting to this memorable occurrence, says, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount." 2 Peter i. 16-18. This event is to be considered: 1. As a solemn confirmation of the prophetic office of Christ. 2. As designed to support the faith of the disciples, which was to be deeply tried by his approaching humiliations; and to afford consolation to the human nature of our Lord himself, by giving him a foretaste of "the joy set before him." 3. As an emblem of humanity glorified at the resurrection. 4. As declaring Christ to be superior to Moses and Elias, the giver and the restorer of the law. 5. As an evidence to the disciples of the existence of a separate state, in which good men consciously enjoy the felicity of heaven. 6. As a proof that the bodies of good men shall be so refined and changed as, like Elias, to live in a state of immortality, and in the presence of God. 7. As exhibiting the sympathy which exists between the Church in heaven and the Church on earth, and the instruction which the former receives from the events which take place in the latter: Moses and Elias conversed with our Lord on his approaching death, doubtless to receive, not to convey information. 8. As maintaining the grand distinction, the infinite difference, between Christ and all other prophets: he is "THE SON," "This is my beloved Son, hear him." It has been observed, with much truth, that the condition in which Jesus Christ appeared among men, humble, weak, poor, and despised, was a true and continual transfiguration; whereas the transfiguration itself, in which he showed himself in the real splendor of his glory, was his true and natural condition.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION. The Lord's Supper being observed in commemoration of the death of Christ, which was the sacrifice offered for the sins of men, the idea of a sacrifice was early conjoined with it; and finally it came to be regarded not merely as the symbol of a sacrifice, but in some sense a sacrifice itself. There was also another cause which contributed to this belief. It was the anxious wish of some of the fathers to give to their religion a degree of splendor which might make a powerful impression upon the senses. Under the Jewish economy, the numerous sacrifices that were offered, in a remarkable degree riveted the attention; and, with reference to this, it became customary to hold forth the Lord's Supper as the great sacrifice in the Christian Church. This mode of speaking quickly gained ground; it is often used by Cyprian, although he plainly understood it in a mystical sense; and the ordinance of the supper was not unfrequently styled the eucharistical sacrifice. It was very early the practice to hold up the elements, previous to their being distributed, to the view of the people, probably to excite in them more effectually devout and reverential feelings; and this laid the foundation for that adoration of them which was, at a subsequent period, as we shall soon find, extensively introduced.

For several ages, says Dr. Cook, the state of opinion respecting the sacramental elements was, that they were memorials of Christ's death, but that, agreeably to his own declaration, his body and blood were, in some sense, present with them. The questions, however, what was the nature of that presence? and what were the physical consequences as to the bread and the wine? however much we may conceive these points to have been involved in the opinion actually held, or the language actually used, seem not to have been for a long period much agitated, or, at all events, not authoritatively decided, although the Roman Catholic writers gladly and triumphantly bring forward the expressions that were so often used from the earliest age, in support of the tenet which their Church at length espoused. But it was not to be supposed that the curiosity of man would be permanently arrested at the threshold of this most mysterious inquiry; and accordingly a definite theory with respect to it was, in the ninth century, avowed and zealously defended. Pascasius Radbert, a monk, and afterward Abbot of Corbey in Picardy, published a treatise concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, in which he did not hesitate to maintain the following most extraordinary positions: "That after the consecration of the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, nothing remained, of these symbols but the outward form or figure, under which the body and blood of Christ were really and locally present; and that this body so present was the identical body that had been born of the Virgin Mary, had suffered on the cross, and had been raised from the dead." The publication of notions so decidedly at war with all which human beings must credit, excited, as might have been expected, astonishment and indignation; and, accordingly, many writers exerted their talents against it. Among these was the celebrated Johannes Scotus, who laid the axe to the root of the tree, and, shaking off all that figurative language which had been so sadly abused, distinctly and powerfully stated, that the bread and wine used in the eucharist were the signs or symbols of the absent body and blood of Christ. The light of reason and truth was, however, too feeble to penetrate through the darkness which, during this age, was spread over the minds and understandings of men. No public declaration, indeed, as to the nature of the sacramental elements was made; and even the popes did not interpose their high and revered authority with regard to it; but there seems little doubt that the opinion of Pascasius was adopted by the greater part of the western Church, although it is not likely that much deference was paid to his explanations of it. The question was again agitated, and attracted more notice than it had ever before done, in the course of the eleventh century. Several theologians, distinguished for the period at which they lived, shocked with the grossness and absurdity of the conversion which had been defended, strenuously opposed it. Among these Berenger holds the most conspicuous place, both on account of the zeal and ability which he displayed, and the cruel and unchristian manner in which he was resisted. About the commencement of the century he began to inculcate that the bread and wine of the eucharist were not truly and actually, but only figuratively, and by similitude, the body and blood of Christ; and a doctrine so rational obtained many adherents in France, Italy, and England. He was, however, encountered by a host of opponents, numbers of whom possessed the highest situations in the Church; and the Church itself, either from having perceived that the doctrine which he labored to confute was grateful to the people, or, what is more likely, tended to exalt the powers and to increase the influence and wealth of the priesthood, declared against him, various councils having been assembled, and having pronounced their solemn decrees in condemnation of what he taught. The councils did not rest their hope of overcoming Berenger upon the strength of the reasoning which they could urge against him: they took a much more summary method, and threatened to put him to death if he did not recant. At one synod held at Rome, under the immediate eye of the pope, the fathers of whom it consisted so successfully alarmed Berenger, that, not having sufficient vigor of mind to stand firm against their cruelty, he confessed that he had been in error, and subscribed the following declaration, composed by one of the cardinals: "The bread and wine which are placed on the altar are, after consecration, not merely a sacrament, symbol, or figure, but even the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is handled by the hands of the priests, and broken and chewed by the teeth of the faithful." He had no sooner escaped from the violence which he had dreaded, than he shrunk from the tenet to which he had been forced to give his assent, and he again avowed his original sentiments; but he was afterward turned aside from his integrity by the arts and the infamous persecution of new councils, although he died adhering to the spirituality of Christ's presence in the eucharist. From this time the strange opinion of Pascasius rapidly gained ground, being supported by all the influence of popes and councils; but there had not yet been devised a term which clearly expressed what was really implied in that opinion. In the next century the ingenuity of some theologian invented what was wanting; the change that takes place on the elements after consecration having been denominated by him transubstantiation. Still, however, some latitude was afforded to those who interpreted the epithet; but this, in the thirteenth century, was taken away—a celebrated council of the Lateran, attended by no fewer than four hundred and twelve bishops, and eight hundred abbots and priors, having, at the instigation of Innocent the Third, one of the most arrogant and presumptuous of the pontiffs, explicitly adopted transubstantiation as an article of faith in the monstrous form in which it is now held in the Popish Church, and denounced anathemas against all who hesitated to give their assent. The opposition which, after this, was made to a doctrine so revolting to the senses and the reason, was very feeble, insomuch that it may, in consequence of the decree of the Lateran council, be considered as having become the established faith of the western Church. In the Greek Church it was long resisted, and, indeed, was not embraced till the seventeenth century, a time at which it might have been thought that it could not have extended the range of its influence.

After transubstantiation was thus sanctioned, a change necessarily took place with respect to various parts of the service used in administering the eucharist. That solemn service was now viewed as an actual sacrifice or offering of the body of Christ for the sins of men, and the elevation of the host was held forth as calling for the adoration and worship of believers; so that an ordinance mercifully designed to preserve the pure influence of the most spiritual and elevated religion, became the instrument, in the hands of ignorant or corrupt men, of introducing the most senseless and degrading idolatry. When the Reformation shook the influence of the Church, and brought into exercise the intellectual faculties of man, the subject of the eucharist demanded and received the closest and most anxious attention. It might have been naturally supposed that when Luther directed his vigorous mind to point out and to condemn the abuses which had been sanctioned in the Popish Church, he would not have spared a doctrine the most irrational and objectionable which that Church avows, and that he would have vindicated the holy ordinance of the Lord's Supper from the abomination with which it had been associated. He did, indeed, object to transubstantiation, but he did so with a degree of hesitation truly astonishing, although that hesitation was displayed by many of the first Reformers. He declared that he saw no warrant for believing that the bread and wine were actually changed into the body and blood of Christ; but he adhered to the literal import of our Saviour's words, teaching that his body and blood were received, and that they were in some incomprehensible manner conjoined or united with the bread and wine. It is quite evident that although this system got rid of one difficulty, by leaving the testimony of the senses as to the bread and wine unchallenged, yet it is just as incomprehensible as the other, assumes as a fact what the senses cannot discern, and involves in it difficulties equally repugnant to the plainest dictates of reason. Powerful, accordingly, as most deservedly was his ascendancy, and great as was the veneration with which he was contemplated, he was upon this point happily opposed; his colleague, the celebrated Carlstadt, openly avowing that when our Lord said of the bread, "This is my body," he pointed to his own person, and thus taught that the bread was merely the sign or emblem of it. Luther warmly resisted this opinion: Carlstadt was obliged—surely in little consistency with the fundamental principle of Protestantism—in consequence of having professed it, to leave Wirtemberg; and although it procured some adherents, yet, as it rested upon an assertion of which there could be no proof, it was never extensively disseminated, and was ultimately abandoned by Carlstadt himself. The discussion, however, which he had commenced stimulated others to the consideration of the subject, and led Zuinglius, who had previously often meditated upon it, and Œcolampadius, two of the most distinguished Reformers, to submit to the public the doctrine, that the bread and wine are only symbols of Christ's body and blood, but that the body of our Lord was in heaven, to which, after his resurrection, he had ascended. Luther composed several works to confute the opinions of Zuinglius. At the commencement of the controversy respecting the eucharist among the defenders of the Protestant faith, there seem to have been only two opinions—that of Luther, asserting that the body and blood of Christ were actually with the bread and wine, and that of Zuinglius, Œcolampadius, and Bucer, that the bread and wine were the emblems or signs of Christ's body and blood, no other advantage being derived from partaking of them than the moral effect naturally resulting from the commemoration of an event so awful and so deeply interesting as the crucifixion of our Redeemer. Calvin soon published what may be regarded as a new view of the subject. Admitting the justness of the interpretation of our Lord's words given by Zuinglius, he maintained that spiritual influence was conveyed to worthy partakers of the Lord's Supper, insomuch that Christ may be said to be spiritually present with the outward elements. The sentiments of this most eminent theologian made a deep impression upon the public mind; and although the Churches of Zurich and Berne long adhered to the creed of Zuinglius, yet, through the perseverance and dexterity of Calvin, the Swiss Protestant Churches at length united with that of Geneva in assenting to the spiritual presence of Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. In other countries too he saw many adhering to what he had taught, and carrying to as great length as it could be carried what, under his system, must be termed the allegorical language which he recommended. The French Protestants, in their confession, thus express themselves: "We affirm that the holy supper of our Lord is a witness to us of our union with the Lord Jesus Christ, because that he is not only once dead and raised up again from the dead for us, but also he doth indeed feed and nourish us with his flesh and blood. And although he be now in heaven, and shall remain there till he come to judge the world, yet we believe that, by the secret and incomprehensible virtue of his Spirit, he doth nourish and quicken us with the substance of his body and blood. But we say that this is done in a spiritual manner; nor do we hereby substitute, in place of the effect and truth, an idle fancy and conceit of our own; but rather, because this mystery of our union with Christ is so high a thing that it surmounteth all our senses, yea, and the whole order of nature, and in short, because it is celestial, it cannot be comprehended but by faith." Knox, who revered Calvin, carried into Scotland the opinions of that Reformer; and in the original Scottish confessions, similar language, though somewhat more guarded than that which has been just quoted, is used: "We assuredly believe that in the supper, rightly used, Christ Jesus is so joined with us that he becometh the very nourishment and food of our souls. Not that we imagine any transubstantiation; but this union and communion which we have with the body and blood of Christ Jesus in the right use of the sacrament is wrought by the operation of the Holy Ghost, who by true faith carrieth us above all things that are visible, carnal, and earthly, and maketh us to feed upon the body and blood of Christ Jesus. We most assuredly believe that the bread which we break is the communion of Christ's body, and the cup which we bless is the communion of his blood; so that we confess and undoubtedly believe that the faithful, in the right use of the Lord's table, so do eat the body and drink the blood of the Lord Jesus that he remaineth in them, and they in him; yea, that they are so made flesh of his flesh, and bones of his bones, that as the eternal Godhead hath given to the flesh of Christ Jesus life and immortality, so doth Christ Jesus's flesh and blood, eaten and drunken by us, give to us the same prerogatives." The Church of Scotland, which did not long use this first confession, seems to have seen, in the course of the following century, the propriety, if not of relinquishing, yet of more cautiously employing the phraseology now brought into view; for in the Westminster Confession, which is still the standard of faith in that Church, there is unquestionably a great improvement in the style which has been adopted in treating of this subject. In it the compilers declare, that "the outward elements in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, duly set apart to the uses ordained by Christ, have such relation to him crucified, as that truly, yet sacramentally only, they are sometimes called by the name of the things they represent; namely, the body and blood of Christ, albeit in substance and nature they still remain truly and only bread and wine, as they were before." Then, after most powerfully exposing the absurdity of transubstantiation, representing it as repugnant not to Scripture alone, but to reason and common sense, they proceed: "Worthy receivers, outwardly partaking of the visible elements in this sacrament, do then also inwardly, by faith, really and indeed, yet not carnally and corporally, but spiritually, receive and feed upon Christ crucified, and all benefits of his death: the body and blood of Christ being then not corporally or carnally in, with, or under the bread and wine, yet as really but spiritually present to the faith of believers in that ordinance, as the elements themselves are to their outward senses." The Church of England was, in its first reformation from Popery, inclined to adhere to the Lutherans; but in the time of Edward the Sixth a more correct and scriptural view seems to have been taken. In the Thirty-nine Articles, the present creed of the English Church, it is said of this ordinance: "The supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather it is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death; inasmuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup is a partaking of the blood of Christ." This strong language is, however, in the same article so modified, as to show that all which was intended by it was to represent the spiritual influence conveyed through the Lord's Supper; for it is taught, "that the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner." The idea of Zuinglius, that the Lord's Supper is merely a commemoration of Christ's death, naturally producing a moral effect upon the serious and considerate mind, has been held by members of both the established Churches in Great Britain. It was vigorously defended about the beginning of last century by Bishop Hoadley, in a work which he entitled, "A Plain Account of the Nature and Ends of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper;" and it has more recently been supported by Dr. Pell, in a treatise denominated, "An Attempt to ascertain the Authority, Nature, and Design of the Lord's Supper." The ingenuity of particular individuals has been exerted in giving other peculiar illustrations of the subject. Cudworth and Bishop Warburton, for example, represented the sacrament of the supper under the view of a feast upon a sacrifice; but such speculations have not influenced the faith of any large denomination of Christians.

[TRAPPISTS. An order of monks founded in the seventeenth century, by Bouthillier de Rance, Abbot of La Trappe. Mosheim says that "at the age of ten he was master of several of the Greek and Roman poets, and understood Homer perfectly. At the age of twelve or thirteen, he gave an edition of Anacreon, with learned annotations. Some writers alleged that he had imbibed the voluptuous spirit of that poet, and that his subsequent application to the study of theology in the Sorbonne did not entirely extinguish it. They also attribute his conversion to a singular incident. They tell us, that returning from the country, after six weeks' absence from a lady whom he loved passionately, (and not in vain,) he went directly to her chamber by a back stair, without having the patience to make any previous inquiry about her health and situation. On opening the door, he found the chamber illuminated, and hung with black, and on approaching the bed, saw the most hideous spectacle that could be presented to his eyes, and the most adapted to mortify passion, inspire horror, and engender the gloom of melancholy devotion in a mind too lively and too much agitated to improve this shocking change to the purposes of rational piety: he saw his fair mistress in her shroud—dead of the small-pox—all her charms fled, and succeeded by the ghastly lines of death, and the frightful marks of that terrible disorder. From that moment, it is said, our abbot retired from the world, and repaired to La Trappe, the most gloomy, barren, and desolate spot in France, and there spent the last forty years of his life in perpetual acts of the most austere piety." He succeeded, however, in vindicating his society from the charge of excessive superstition, which the Jansenists had drawn on themselves by their austerity. The order still subsists, as the "Reformed Bernardins of La Trappe." They profess to follow the Cistercian rule, but their discipline has been much relaxed.]

TRAVELLING. The mode in which the patriarchs performed their pastoral migrations will be illustrated, with several differences in circumstances, by the following extract from Parsons's Travels: "It was entertaining enough to see the horde of Arabs decamp, as nothing could be more regular. First went the sheep and goat herds, each with their flocks in divisions, according as the chief of each family directed; then followed the camels and asses, loaded with the tents, furniture, and kitchen utensils; these were followed by the old men, women, boys, and girls on foot. The children that cannot walk are carried on the backs of the young women, or the boys and girls; and the smallest of the lambs and kids are carried under the arms of the children. To each tent belong many dogs, among which are some greyhounds; some tents have from ten to fourteen dogs, and from twenty to thirty men, women, and children belonging to it. The procession is closed by the chief of the tribe, whom they call emir and father, (emir means prince,) mounted on the very best horse, and surrounded by the heads of each family, all on horses, with many servants on foot. Between each family is a division or space of one hundred yards or more, when they migrate; and such great regularity is observed, that neither camels, asses, sheep, nor dogs mix, but each keeps to the division to which it belongs without the least trouble. They had been here eight days, and were going four hours' journey to the north-west, to another spring of water. This tribe consisted of about eight hundred and fifty men, women, and children. Their flocks of sheep and goats were about five thousand, besides a great number of camels, horses, and asses. Horses and greyhounds they breed and train up for sale: they neither kill nor sell their ewe-lambs. At set times a chapter in the Koran is read by the chief of each family, either in or near each tent, the whole family being gathered round, and very attentive." Instead of the Koran of modern times, let us conceive of Abraham, and other patriarchal emirs, collecting their numerous dependents, and teaching them the true religion, and we then see with what truth they are called the Lord's "prophets."

TREASURE. The Hebrew word signifies any thing collected together, provisions, or magazines. So they say, a treasure of corn, of wine, of oil, of honey, Jer. xli. 8; treasures of gold, silver, brass, Ezek. xxviii. 4; Dan. xi. 43. Snow, winds, hail, rain, waters, are in the treasures of God. Psalm cxxxv. 7; Jer. li. 16. The wise men opened their treasures, Matt. ii. 11, that is, their packets or bundles, to offer presents to our Saviour. Joseph acquainted his brethren, when they found their money returned in their sacks, that God had given them treasures. Genesis xliii. 23. The treasures of the house of God, whether in silver, corn, wine, or oil, were under the care of the Levites. The kings of Judah had also keepers of the treasures both in city and country, 1 Chron. xxvii. 25; and the places where these magazines were laid up were called treasure cities. Pharaoh compelled the Hebrews to build him treasure cities, or magazines. [Exod. i. 11.]

TREE is the first and largest of the vegetable kind, consisting of a single trunk, out of which spring forth branches and leaves. Heat is so essential to the growth of trees, that we see them grow larger and smaller in a sort of gradation as the climates in which they stand are more or less hot. The hottest countries yield, in general, the largest and tallest trees, and those, also, in much greater beauty and variety than the colder do; and even those plants which are common to both, arrive at a much greater bulk in the southern than in the northern climates; nay, there are some regions so bleak and chill, that they raise no vegetables at all to any considerable height. Greenland, Iceland, and similar places, afford no trees at all; and the shrubs which grow in them are always little and low. In the warmer climates, where trees grow to a moderate size, any accidental diminution of the common heat is found very greatly to impede vegetation; and even in England the cold summers we sometimes have, give us an evident proof of this in the scarcity of produce from all our large fruit trees. Heat, whatever be the producing cause, acts as well upon vegetation one way as another. Thus the heat of manure, and the artificial heat of coal fires in stoves, are found to supply the place of the sun. Great numbers of the eastern trees, in their native soil, flower twice in a year, and some flower and bear ripe fruit all the year round; and it is observed of these last, that they are at once the most frequent and the most useful to the inhabitants; their fruits, which always hang on them in readiness, containing cool juices, which are good in fevers, and other of the common diseases of hot countries. The umbrageous foliage with which the God of providence has generally furnished all trees in warm climates, affords a most refreshing and grateful shade to those who seek relief from the direct and hurtful rays of a tropical sun.

The Land of Promise cannot boast, like many other countries, of extensive woods; but considerable thickets of trees and of reeds sometimes arise to diversify and adorn the scene. Between the Lake Samochonites and the Sea of Tiberias, the river Jordan is almost concealed by shady trees from the view of the traveller. When the waters of the Jordan are low, the Lake Samochonites is only a marsh, for the most part dry and overgrown with shrubs and reeds. In these thickets, among other ferocious animals, the wild boar seeks a covert from the burning rays of the sun. Large herds of them are sometimes to be seen on the banks of the river, near the Sea of Tiberias, lying among the reeds, or feeding under the trees. Such moist and shady places are in all countries the favorite haunts of these fierce and dangerous animals. Those marshy coverts are styled woods in the Sacred Scriptures; for the wild boar of the wood is the name which that creature receives from the royal Psalmist: "The boar out of the wood doth waste it; and the wild beast of the field doth devour it." Psalm lxxx. 13. The wood of Ephraim, where the battle was fought between the forces of Absalom and the servants of David, was probably a place of the same kind; for the sacred historian observes, that the wood devoured more people that day than the sword. 2 Sam. xviii. 8. Some have supposed the meaning of this passage to be, that the soldiers of Absalom were destroyed by the wild beasts of the wood; but it can scarcely be supposed that in the reign of David, when the Holy Land was crowded with inhabitants, the wild beasts could be so numerous in one of the woods as to cause such a destruction. But supposing the wood of Ephraim to have been a morass covered with trees and bushes, like the haunts of the wild boar near the banks of Jordan, the difficulty is easily removed. It is certain that such a place has more than once proved fatal to contending armies, partly by suffocating those who, in the hurry of fight, inadvertently venture over places incapable of supporting them, and partly by retarding them till their pursuers come up and cut them to pieces. In this manner a greater number of men than fell in the heat of battle may be destroyed. It is probable, however, that nothing more is intended by the sacred historian than the mention of a fact familiar to military men in all ages—whatever kind of weapons were then employed in warfare—that forests, especially such thick and impassable forests as are common in warm countries, constitute the very worst ground along which a discomfited army can be compelled to retreat. Their orderly ranks are broken; the direction which each warrior for his own safety must take is uncertain; and while one tumultuous mass is making a pass for itself through intervening brushwood and closely matted jungle, and another is hurrying along a different path and encountering similar or perhaps greater impediments, the cool and deliberate pursuers, whether archers or sharpshooters, enjoy an immense advantage in being able to choose their own points of annoyance, and by flank or cross attacks to kill their retreating foes, with scarcely any risk to themselves, but with immense carnage to the routed army.

Several critics imagine that by עץ חרר, rendered "goodly trees," Lev. xxiii. 40, the citron tree is intended. עץ עבר, rendered "thick trees" in the same verse, and in Neh. viii. 15, Ezek. xx. 28, is the myrtle, according to the rabbins, the Chaldee paraphrase, Syriac version, and Deodatus. The word אשל, translated "grove" in Gen.

xxi. 33, has been variously translated. Parkhurst renders it an oak, and says, that from this word may be derived the name of the famous asylum opened by Romulus between two groves of oak at Rome. On the other hand, Celsius, Michaelis, and Dr. Geddes render it the tamarisk, which is a lofty and beautiful tree, and grows abundantly in Egypt and Arabia. The same word in 1 Sam. xxii. 6; xxxi. 13, is rendered "a tree." It must be noted, too, that in the first of these places the common version is equally obscure and contradictory, by making ramah a proper name: it signifies hillock or bank. Of the trees that produced precious balsams, there was one in particular that long flourished in Judea, having been supposed to have been an object of great attention to Solomon, which was afterward transplanted to Matrea, in Egypt, where it continued till about two hundred and fifty years ago, according to Maillet, who gives a description of it, drawn, it is supposed, from the Arabian authors, in which he says, "This shrub had two very differently colored barks, the one red, the other perfectly green; that they tasted strongly like incense and turpentine, and when bruised between the fingers they smelt very nearly like cardamoms. This balsam, which was extremely precious and celebrated, and was used by the Coptic Church in their chrism, was produced by a very low shrub; and it is said that all those shrubs that produced balsams are everywhere low, and do not exceed two or three cubits in height."

Descriptions of the principal trees and shrubs mentioned in holy writ, the reader will find noticed in distinct articles under their several denominations.

[TREE OF KNOWLEDGE. Gen. ii. 9, 17; iii. This appears to have been designed to be the test of man's fealty to his Sovereign, a token of his probationary state, and a standing admonition concerning the moral good and evil of human actions.]

[TREE OF LIFE. Gen. ii. 9; iii. 22-24. This seems to have been a pledge of man's immortality, and perhaps a means of securing it. Hence the allusion to it, Prov. iii. 18; xi. 30; xiii. 12; xv. 4: Rev. ii. 7; xxii. 2, 14. The Greek word for tree in all those places in Genesis and Revelation, and in Prov. iii., is not δένδρον, the word used in the other places in Proverbs, and usually in the New Testament, but ξύλον, which is rendered "tree" in Acts v. 30; x. 39: Gal. iii. 13: 1 Pet. ii. 24, and which in these places means the cross. It is rendered "tree" in one other place, Luke xxiii. 31, where the metaphor of a green tree and a dry tree refers to the use made of them as wood.]

[TRENCH. מַעְגָּל, מַעְגָּל, 1 Sam. xvii. 20; xxvi. 5, 7, seems to mean a round camp, like that of the Arabs, the chief being in the middle, and his men disposed around him. רֶמֶס, rendered trench, 1 Kings xviii. 32, 35, 38, is rendered conduit, 2 Kings xviii. 17, and water-course, Job xxxviii. 25. Χάραξ, Luke xix. 43, means a paliade, or rampart, constructed around a city by besiegers to secure themselves from the attacks of the besieged, and to prevent their egress. Josephus says Titus erected a wall of this sort around Jerusalem, thus verifying Christ's prediction.]

[TRENTAL. A service of thirty masses, rehearsed for any one thirty days successively after his death.]

[TRENT, COUNCIL OF. The eighteenth and last of the so-called ecumenical councils recognized by the Church of Rome. It was convened in 1545, by Pope Paul III., who, in his bull of indiction, gave as reasons for summoning it, the deliverance of the Church from the new heresies which had sprung up, and the restoration of the ancient discipline. Its sessions were continued at Trent till March, 1547; then transferred to Bologna, and continued till September, 1548, when they were suspended by Paul III.; resumed, by order of Julius III., at Trent, May, 1551; suspended April, 1552; resumed, by order of Pius IV., January, 1562, and closed December, 1563. They were twenty-five in all; though Sarpi says some of them were attended by only forty or fifty ecclesiastics. Its acts, however, were subscribed by four legates, two cardinals, three patriarchs, twenty-five archbishops, one hundred and sixty-eight bishops, thirty-nine proctors, seven abbots, seven generals of orders, and confirmed by Pius, January 26, 1564. In December, 1564, Pius published a summary of Tridentine doctrines, known as the Creed of Pope Pius IV., which all converts to Rome must subscribe. (See ROMAN CATHOLICS.) The council, however, failed to produce the results for which it was convened: its canons and decrees were rejected by every Protestant state: they were, of course, received in Popish countries, but in some of these under certain restrictions, as in Spain with a salvo respecting the prerogatives of the crown, and in France with a similar reservation, including the Gallican Liberties. As some things that were not previously considered articles of faith were defined as such by the Tridentine fathers; as others that Rome considered articles of faith are not defined as such; and as others are ambiguously presented by them, some of the Romish doctors appeal from the council to Scripture and tradition, and Sixtus V. instituted a "Congregation for interpreting the Decrees of the Council of Trent." Histories of the council have been written by Father Paul Sarpi, a Venetian, and by Sforza Pallavicini, an Italian Jesuit, of whom Ranke says, "Both are heart and soul partisans"—Sarpi being an accuser and Pallavicini a defender of the council. Availing himself of the criticisms of Ranke and the Abbé le Courayer on these historians, and the researches of Mendham, Le Plat, and others, the Rev. T. A. Buckley has composed a judicious "History of the Council of Trent," which he has published, together with two other volumes, containing, respectively, "The Canons and Decrees," and "The Catechism of the Council of Trent." M. Bungeger has also published a "History," of a more anti-papal tone. See COUNCIL.]

[TRESPASS. שם means damage, Num. v. 7; guilt or guiltiness, Gen. xxvi. 10; compare Psalm lxviii. 22: (21, Eng. :) Jer. li. 5; sin of criminal carelessness, and also the offering for such a sin, Lev. v. 6, 7, 16. מזל, declension, or apostasy, in regard either to faith or practice, Lev. v. 15: Job xxi. 34: Ezek. xiv. 18; xv. 8; xviii. 24; xx. 27. Παράπτωμα is applied in a similar way to the fall of Adam, Rom. v. 15, 17, 18; to the fall of Israel, Rom. xi. 11, 12; to transgression in general, Matt. vi. 14, 15; xviii. 35: Mark xi. 25, 26: 2 Cor. v. 19: Eph. ii. 1.]

[TRESPASS-OFFERING. See OFFERINGS.]

TRIBE. Jacob having twelve sons, who were the heads of so many great families, which altogether formed a great nation, every one of these families was called a tribe. But Jacob on his death-bed adopted Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph, and would have them also to constitute two tribes of Israel. Gen. xlviii. 5. In stead of twelve tribes, there were now thirteen, that of Joseph being divided into two. However, in the distribution of lands to each which Joshua made by the order of God, they counted but twelve tribes, and made but twelve lots. For the tribe of Levi, which was appointed to the service of the tabernacle of the Lord, had no share in the distribution of the land, but only some cities in which to dwell, and the first-fruits, tithes, and oblations of the people, which constituted all their subsistence. The twelve tribes continued united under one head, making but one state, one people, and one monarchy, till after the death of Solomon. Then ten of the tribes of Israel revolted from the house of David, and received for their king Jeroboam, the son of Nebat; and only the tribes of Judah and Benjamin continued under the government of Rehoboam. This separation may be looked upon as the chief cause of those great misfortunes that afterward happened to those two kingdoms, and to the whole Hebrew nation. For, first, it was the cause of the alteration and change of the old religion, and of the ancient worship of their forefathers. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, substituted the worship of golden calves for the worship of the true God; which was the occasion of the ten tribes forsaking the temple of the Lord. Secondly, this schism caused an irreconcilable hatred between the ten tribes and those of Judah and Benjamin, and created numerous wars and disputes between them. The Lord being provoked, delivered them up to their enemies. Tiglath-pileser first took away captive the tribes of Reuben, Gad, Naphtali, and the half tribe of Manasseh, which were beyond Jordan, and carried them beyond the Euphrates. 2 Kings xv. 29: 1 Chron. v. 26; A. M. 3264. Some years after, Shalmaneser, King of Assyria, took the city of Samaria, destroyed it, took away the rest of the inhabitants of Israel, carried them beyond the Euphrates, and sent other inhabitants into the country to cultivate and possess it. 2 Kings xvii. 6; xviii. 10, 11. Thus ended the kingdom of the ten tribes of Israel, A. M. 3283. As to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, who remained under the government of the kings of the family of David, they continued a much longer time in their own country. But at last, after they had filled up the measure of their iniquity, God delivered them all into the hands of their enemies. Nebuchadnezzar took the city of Jerusalem, entirely ruined it, and took away all the inhabitants of Judah and Benjamin to Babylon, and the other provinces of his empire, A. M. 3416. The return from this captivity is stated in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. See JEWS.

[TRIBULATION. τλ, Deut. iv. 30; Judg. x. 14; 1 Sam. x. 19; xxvi. 24, means a strait, distress; rendered by the LXX. θλίψις, the word used Matt. xiii. 21; xxiv. 21; Acts xiv. 22; Rom. ii. 9; v. 3; rendered "affliction," Mark xiii. 19, Acts vii. 10, James i. 27; "anguish," John xvi. 21; "persecution," Acts xi. 19; "trouble," 1 Cor. vii. 28. The Vulgate has angustia, Judg. x. 14, 1 Sam. xxvi. 24, pressura, John xvi. 21; in all the other places specified, it has tribulatio, which comes from tribulum, τρίβολος, a threshing-machine, or roller for pressing out the grains of corn—a suggestive etymology.]

TRIBUTE. The Hebrews acknowledged none for sovereign over them but God alone; whence Josephus calls their government a theocracy, or Divine government. They acknowledged the sovereign dominion of God by a tribute, or capitation tax, of half a shekel a head, which every Israelite paid yearly. Exod. xxx. 13. Our Saviour, in the Gospel, thus reasons with St. Peter: "What thinkest thou, Simon? of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers?" Matt. xvii. 25; meaning, that as he was the Son of God, he ought to be exempt from this capitation tax. We do not find that either the kings or the judges of the Hebrews, when they were themselves Jews, demanded any tribute of them. Solomon, at the beginning of his reign, 1 Kings xi. 22, 33, 2 Chron. viii. 9, compelled the Canaanites who were left in the country to pay him tribute, and to perform the drudgery of the public works he had undertaken. As to the children of Israel, he would not suffer one of them to be employed upon them, but made them his soldiers, ministers, and chief officers, to command his armies, his chariots, and his horsemen. Yet afterward, toward the end of his reign, he imposed a tribute upon them, and made them work at the public buildings, 1 Kings v. 13, 14; ix. 15; xi. 27; which much alienated their minds from him, and sowed the seeds of that discontent which afterward appeared in an open revolt, by the rebellion of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who was at first, indeed, obliged to take shelter in Egypt. But afterward the defection became general by the total revolt of the ten tribes. Hence it was that the Israelites said to Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, "Thy father made our yoke grievous; now therefore make thou the grievous service of thy father, and the heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee." 1 Kings xii. 4. It is needless to observe, that the Israelites were frequently subdued by foreign princes, who laid great taxes and tribute upon them, to which fear and necessity compelled them to submit. Yet in the latter times, that is, after Archelaus had been banished to Vienne in France, in the sixth year of the vulgar era, and after Judea was reduced to a province, Augustus sent Quirinius into this country to take a new poll of the people, and to make a new estimate of their substance, that he might thereby regulate the tribute that every one was to pay to the Romans. Then Judas, surnamed the Galilean, formed a sedition, and made an insurrection, to oppose the levying of this tribute. See in St. Matthew xxii. 16, 17, etc., the answer that Jesus Christ returned to the Pharisee who came with an insidious design of tempting him, and asked him whether or not it was lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar? and in John viii. 33, where the Jews boast of having never been slaves to anybody, of being a free nation, that acknowledged God only for master and sovereign.

[TRICHOTOMY. The theory according to which man is divided into three parts, supposed to be countenanced by 1 Thess. v. 23, where, however, the spirit and soul are not distinguished in regard to essence, but operation. Compare Matt. x. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 20. Some of the Greek fathers, tinctured with Stoic, Pythagorean, and Platonic notions, held this theory, but they were opposed by the Latins. It has been favored by some moderns. See Macknight on 1 Thess. v. 23, and Olshausen on Matt. x. 28.]

[TRIDENTINE. Belonging to the Council of Trent.]

[TRIERS. Thirty-eight commissioners chosen by Cromwell, in 1654. They were chiefly Independents, though some were Presbyterians. They sat at Whitehall to try candidates for clerical institution and induction, and to eject ignorant and incompetent ministers and schoolmasters.]

TRINITY. That nearly all the pagan nations of antiquity, says Bishop Tomline, in their various theological systems acknowledged a kind of Trinity, has been fully evinced by those learned men who have made the heathen mythology the subject of their elaborate inquiries. The almost universal prevalence of this doctrine in the Gentile kingdoms must be considered as a strong argument in favor of its truth. The doctrine itself bears such striking internal marks of a Divine original, and is so very unlikely to have been the invention of mere human reason, that there is no way of accounting for the general adoption of so singular a belief, but by supposing that it was revealed by God to the early patriarchs, and that it was transmitted by them to their posterity. In its progress, indeed, to remote countries and to distant generations, this belief became depraved and corrupted in the highest degree; and he alone who brought "life and immortality to light," could restore it to its original simplicity and purity. The discovery of the existence of this doctrine in the early ages, among the nations whose records have been the best preserved, has been of great service to the cause of Christianity, and completely refutes the assertion of infidels and skeptics, that the sublime and mysterious doctrine of the Trinity owes its origin to the philosophers of Greece. "If we extend," says Mr. Maurice, "our eye through the remote region of antiquity, we shall find this very doctrine, which the primitive Christians are said to have borrowed from the Platonic school, universally and immemorably flourishing in all those countries where history and tradition have united to fix those virtuous ancestors of the human race who, for their distinguished attainments in piety, were admitted to a familiar intercourse with Jehovah and the angels, the divine heralds of his commands." The same learned author justly considers the first two verses of the Old Testament as containing very strong if not decisive evidence in support of the truth of this doctrine: Elohim, a noun substantive of the plural number, by which the Creator is expressed, appears as evidently to point toward a plurality of persons in the Divine nature, as the verb in the singular, with which it is joined, does to the unity of that nature: "In the beginning God created;" with strict attention to grammatical propriety, the passage should be rendered, "In the beginning Gods created;" but our belief in the unity of God forbids us thus to translate the word Elohim. Since, therefore, Elohim is plural, and no plural can consist of less than two in number, and since creation can alone be the work of Deity, we are to understand by this term, so particularly used in this place, God the Father, and the eternal Logos, or Word of God; that Logos whom St. John, supplying us with an excellent comment upon this passage, says, was in the beginning with God, and who also was God. As the Father and the Son are expressly pointed out in the first verse of this chapter, so is the Third Person in the blessed Trinity not less decisively revealed to us in Genesis i. 2: "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters:" "brooded upon" the water, incubavit, as a hen broods over her eggs. Thus we see the Spirit exerted, upon this occasion, an active effectual energy, by that energy agitating the vast abyss, and infusing into it a powerful vital principle.

Elohim seems to be the general appellation by which the Triune Godhead is collectively distinguished in Scripture; and in the concise history of the creation only, the expression, bara Elohim, "the Gods created," is used above thirty times. The combining of this plural noun with a verb in the singular would not appear so remarkable if Moses had uniformly adhered to that mode of expression; for then it would be evident that he adopted the mode used by the Gentiles in speaking of their false gods in the plural number, but, by joining with it a singular verb or adjective, rectified a phrase that might appear to give a direct sanction to the error of polytheism. But, in reality, the reverse is the fact; for in Deut. xxxii. 15, 17, and other places, he uses the singular number of this very noun to express the Deity, though not employed in the august work of creation: "He forsook God," Eloah; "they sacrificed to devils, not to God," Eloah. But further, Moses himself uses this very word, Elohim, with verbs and adjectives in the plural. Of this usage Dr. Allix enumerates many other striking instances that might be brought from the Pentateuch; and other inspired writers use it in the same manner in various parts of the Old Testament. Job xxxv. 10: Joshua xxiv. 19: Psalm cix. 1: Eccl. xii. 3: 2 Sam. vii. 23. It must appear, therefore, to every reader of reflection, exceedingly singular, that when Moses was endeavoring to establish a theological system, of which the unity of the Godhead was the leading principle, and in which it differed from all other systems, he should make use of terms directly implicative of a plurality in it; yet so deeply was the awful truth under consideration impressed upon the mind of the Hebrew legislator, that this is constantly done by him; and, indeed, as Allix has observed, there is scarcely any method of speaking from which a plurality in Deity may be inferred, that is not used either by himself in the Pentateuch, or by the other inspired writers in various parts of the Old Testament. A plural is joined with a verb singular, as in the passage cited before from Genesis i. 1: a plural is joined with a verb plural, as in Gen. xxxv. 7, "And Jacob called the name of the place El-beth-el, because the Gods there appeared to him:" a plural is joined with an adjective plural, Joshua xxiv. 19, "Ye cannot serve the Lord; for he is the holy Gods." To these passages if we add that remarkable one from Ecclesiastes, "Remember thy Creators in the days of thy youth," and the predominant use of the terms, Jehovah Elohim, or the "Lord thy Gods," which occur a hundred times in the law, (the word Jehovah implying the unity of the essence, and Elohim a plurality in that unity,) we must allow that nothing can be more plainly marked than this doctrine in the ancient Scriptures.

Though the august name of Jehovah in a more peculiar manner belongs to God the Father, yet is that name, in various parts of Scripture, applied to each person in the holy Trinity. The Hebrews considered that name in so sacred a light, that they never pronounced it, and used the word Adonai instead of it. It was, indeed, a name that ranked first among their profoundest cabala: a mystery, sublime, ineffable, incommunicable. It was called tetragrammaton, or the name of four letters, and these letters are jod, he, vau, he, the proper pronunciation of which, from long disuse, is said to be no longer known to the Jews themselves. This awful name was first revealed by God to Moses from the centre of the burning bush; and Josephus, who, as well as Scripture, relates this circumstance, evinces his veneration for it, by calling it the name which his religion did not permit him to mention. From this word the pagan title of Iao and Jove is, with the greatest probability, supposed to have been originally formed; and in the Golden Verses of Pythagoras, there is an oath still extant to this purpose, "By Him who has the four letters." As the name Jehovah, however in some instances applied to the Son and the Holy Spirit, was the proper name of God the Father, so is Logos in as peculiar a manner the appropriated name of God the Son. The Chaldee Paraphrasts translate the original Hebrew text by Mimra da Jehovah, literally, "the Word of Jehovah," a term totally different, as Bishop Kidder has incontestably proved, in its signification, and in its general application among the Jews, from the Hebrew dabar, which simply means a discourse or decree, and is properly rendered by pitgham. In the Septuagint translation of the Bible—a work supposed by the Jews to have been undertaken by men immediately inspired from above—the former term is universally rendered Λόγος, and it is so rendered and so understood by Philo and all the more ancient rabbins. The name of the third person in the ever-blessed Trinity has descended unaltered from the days of Moses to our own time; for, as well in the sacred writings as by the Targumists, and by the modern doctors of the Jewish Church, he is styled Ruach Hakodesh, the Holy Spirit. He is sometimes, however, in the rabbinical books, denominated Shekinah, or Glory of Jehovah; in some places he is called Sephirah, or Wisdom; and in others Binah, or Understanding. From the enumeration of these circumstances, it must be sufficiently evident to the mind which unites piety and reflection, that so far from being silent upon the subject, the ancient Scriptures commence with an avowal of this doctrine, and that, in fact, the creation was the result of the joint operations of the Trinity.

If the argument above offered should still appear inconclusive, the twenty-sixth verse of the first chapter of Genesis contains so pointed an attestation to the truth of it, that, when duly considered, it must stagger the most hardened skeptic; for in that text not only the plurality is unequivocally expressed, but the act which is the peculiar prerogative of Deity is mentioned together with that plurality, the one circumstance illustrating the other, and both being highly elucidatory of this doctrine: "And God (Elohim) said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." Why the Deity should speak of himself in the plural number, unless that Deity consisted of more than one person, it is difficult to conceive; for the answer given by the modern Jews, that this is only a figurative mode of expression, implying the high dignity of the speaker, and that it is usual for earthly sovereigns to use this language by way of distinction, is futile, for two reasons. In the first place, it is highly degrading to the Supreme Majesty to suppose he would take his model of speaking and thinking from man, though it is highly consistent with the vanity of man to arrogate to himself, as doubtless was the case in the licentiousness of succeeding ages, the style and imagined conceptions of Deity; and it will be remembered that these solemn words were spoken before the creation of any of those mortals whose false notions of greatness and sublimity the Almighty is thus impiously supposed to adopt. In truth, there does not seem to be any real dignity in an expression which, when used by a human sovereign in relation to himself, approaches very near to absurdity. The genuine fact, however, appears to be this. When the tyrants of the east first began to assume Divine honors, they assumed likewise the majestic language appropriated to and highly becoming the Deity, but totally inapplicable to man. The error was propagated from age to age through a long succession of despots, and at length Judaic apostasy arrived at such a pitch of profane absurdity, as to affirm that very phraseology to be borrowed from man, which was the original and peculiar language of the Divinity. It was, indeed, remarkably pertinent when applied to Deity; for in a succeeding chapter we have more decisive authority for what is thus asserted, where the Lord God himself says, "Behold, the man is become as one of us;" a very singular expression, which some Jewish commentators, with equal effrontery, contend was spoken by the Deity to the council of angels that, according to their assertions, attended him at the creation. From the name of the Lord God being used in so emphatical a manner, it evidently appears to be addressed to those sacred persons to whom it was before said, "Let us make man;"

for would indeed the omnipotent Jehovah, presiding in a less dignified council, use words that have such an evident tendency to place the Deity on a level with created beings?

The first passage to be adduced from the New Testament in proof of this important doctrine of the Trinity, is the charge and commission which our Saviour gave to his apostles, to "go and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Matt. xxviii. 19. The gospel is everywhere in Scripture represented as a covenant or conditional offer of eternal salvation from God to man; and baptism was the appointed ordinance by which men were to be admitted into that covenant, by which that offer was made and accepted. This covenant being to be made with God himself, the ordinance must of course be performed in his name; but Christ directed that it should be performed in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and therefore we conclude that God is the same as the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Since baptism is to be performed in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, they must be all three persons; and since no superiority or difference whatever is mentioned in this solemn form of baptism, we conclude that these three persons are all of one substance, power, and eternity. Are we to be baptized in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and is it possible that the Father should be self-existent, eternal, the Lord God Omnipotent, and that the Son, in whose name we are equally baptized, should be a mere man, born of a woman, and subject to all the frailties and imperfections of human nature? or is it possible that the Holy Ghost, in whose name also we are equally baptized, should be a bare energy or operation, a quality or power, without even personal existence? Our feelings, as well as our reason, revolt from the idea of such disparity.

This argument will derive great strength from the practice of the early ages, and from the observations which we meet with in several of the ancient fathers relative to it. We learn from Ambrose, that persons at the time of their baptism declared their belief in the three persons of the Holy Trinity, and that they were dipped in the water three times. In his Treatise upon the Sacraments he says, "Thou wast asked at thy baptism, Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty? and thou didst reply, I believe, and thou wast dipped; and a second time thou wast asked, Dost thou believe in Jesus Christ the Lord? thou didst answer again, I believe, and thou wast dipped; a third time the question was repeated, Dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost? and the answer was, I believe; then thou wast dipped a third time." It is to be noticed that the belief, here expressed separately, in the three persons of the Trinity, is precisely the same in all. Tertullian, Basil, and Jerome, all mention this practice of trine immersion as ancient; and Jerome says, "We are thrice dipped in the water, that the mystery of the Trinity may appear to be but one. We are not baptized in the names of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, but in one name, which is God's; and, therefore, though we be thrice put under water to represent the mystery of the Trinity, yet it is reputed but one baptism." Thus the mysterious union of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, as one God, was, in the opinion of the purer ages of the Christian Church, clearly expressed in this form of baptism. By it the primitive Christians understood the Father's gracious acceptance of the atonement offered by the Messiah; the peculiar protection of the Son, our great High-Priest and Intercessor; and the readiness of the Holy Ghost to sanctify, to assist, and to comfort all the obedient followers of Christ, confirmed by the visible gift of tongues, of prophecy, and divers other gifts, to the first disciples. And as their great Master's instructions evidently distinguished these persons from each other, without any difference in their authority or power, all standing forth as equally dispensing the benefits of Christianity, as equally the objects of the faith required in converts upon admission into the Church, they clearly understood that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost were likewise equally the objects of their grateful worship: this fully appears from their prayers, doxologies, hymns, and creeds, which are still extant.

The second passage to be produced in support of the doctrine now under consideration, is the doxology at the conclusion of St. Paul's Second Epistle to the Corinthians: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." The manner in which Christ and the Holy Ghost are here mentioned, implies that they are persons, for none but persons can confer grace or fellowship; and these three great blessings of grace, love, and fellowship, being respectively prayed for by the inspired apostle from Jesus Christ, God the Father, and the Holy Ghost, without any intimation of disparity, we conclude that these three persons are equal and Divine. This solemn benediction may therefore be considered as another proof of the Trinity, since it acknowledges the Divinity of Jesus Christ and of the Holy Ghost. The third passage is the following salutation or benediction in the beginning of the Revelation of St. John: "Grace and peace from Him which is, and which was, and which is to come; and from the seven Spirits which are before his throne, and from Jesus Christ." Here the Father is described by a periphrasis taken from his attribute of eternity; and "the seven Spirits" is a mystical expression for the Holy Ghost, used upon this occasion either because the salutation is addressed to seven Churches, every one of which had partaken of the Spirit, or because seven was a sacred number among the Jews, denoting both variety and perfection, and in this case alluding to the various gifts, administrations, and operations of the Holy Ghost. Since grace and peace are prayed for from these three persons jointly and without discrimination, we infer an equality in their power to dispense those blessings; and we further conclude that these three persons together constitute the Supreme Being, who is alone the object of prayer, and is alone the Giver of every good and of every perfect gift. It might be right to remark, that the seven Spirits cannot mean angels, since prayers are never in Scripture addressed to angels, nor are blessings ever pronounced in their name. It is unnecessary to quote any of the numerous passages in which the Father is singly called God, as some of them must be recollected by every one, and the Divinity of the Father is not called in question by any sect of Christians; and those passages which prove the Divinity of the Son and of the Holy Ghost separately, will be more properly considered under those heads. In the mean time we may observe, that if it shall appear from Scripture that Christ is God, and the Holy Ghost is God, it will follow, since we are assured that there is but one God, that the three persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, by a mysterious union, constitute the one God, or, as it is expressed in the first article of the Church of England: "There is a Trinity in Unity; and in the unity of this Godhead there be, three Persons of one substance, power, and eternity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

The word Trinity does not occur in Scripture, nor do we find it in any of the early confessions of faith; but this is no argument against the doctrine itself, since we learn from the fathers of the first three centuries, that the Divinity of the Son and of the Holy Ghost was, from the days of the apostles, acknowledged by the catholic Church, and that those who maintained a contrary opinion were considered as heretics; and as every one knows that neither the Divinity of the Father nor the unity of the Godhead was ever called in question at any period, it follows that the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity has been in substance, in all its constituent parts, always known among Christians. In the fourth century it became the subject of eager and general controversy; and it was not till then that this doctrine was particularly discussed. While there was no denial or dispute, proof and defence were unnecessary: Nunquid enim perfecte de Trinitate tractatum est, antequam oblatrarent Arian? But this doctrine is positively mentioned as being admitted among catholic Christians, by writers who lived long before that age of controversy. Justin Martyr, in refuting the charge of atheism urged against Christians, because they did not believe in the gods of the heathen, expressly says, "We worship and adore the Father, and the Son who came from him and taught us these things, and the prophetic Spirit;" and soon after, in the same apology, he undertakes to show the reasonableness of the honor paid by Christians to the Father in the first place, to the Son in the second, and to the Holy Ghost in the third; and says, that their assigning the second place to a crucified man, was, by unbelievers, denominated madness, because they were ignorant of the mystery, which he then proceeds to explain. Athenagoras, in replying to the same charge of atheism urged against Christians, because they refused to worship the false gods of the heathen, says, "Who would not wonder when he knows that we, who call upon God the Father, and God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit, showing their power in the unity, and their distinction in order, should be called atheists?" Clement of Alexandria not only mentions three Divine persons.

but invokes them as one only God. Praxeas, Sabellius, and other Unitarians, accused the orthodox Christians of tritheism, which is of itself a clear proof that the orthodox worshipped the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and though in reality they considered these three persons as constituting the one true God, it is obvious that their enemies might easily represent that worship as an acknowledgment of three Gods. Tertullian, in writing against Praxeas, maintains that a Trinity rationally conceived is consistent with truth, and that unity irrationally conceived forms heresy. He had before said, in speaking of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, that "there are three of one substance, and of one condition, and of one power, because there is one God;" and he afterward adds, "The connection of the Father in the Son, and of the Son in the Comforter, makes three united together, the one with the other; which three are one thing, not one person; as it is said, I and the Father are one thing, with regard to the unity of substance, not to the singularity of number." And he also expressly says, "The Father is God, and the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God." And again, "The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, believed to be three, constitute one God." And in another part of his works he says, "There is a Trinity of one Divinity, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost." And Tertullian not only maintains these doctrines, but asserts that they were prior to any heresy, and had, indeed, been the faith of Christians from the first promulgation of the gospel. To these writers of the second century, we may add Origen and Cyprian in the third; the former of whom mentions baptism (alluding to its appointed form) as "the source and fountain of graces to him who dedicates himself to the Divinity of the adorable Trinity." And the latter, after reciting the same form of baptism, says that "by it Christ delivered the doctrine of the Trinity, unto which mystery or sacrament the nations were to be baptized." It would be easy to multiply quotations upon this subject; but these are amply sufficient to show the opinions of the early fathers, and to refute the assertion that the doctrine of the Trinity was an invention of the fourth century. To these positive testimonies may be subjoined a negative argument: those who acknowledged the Divinity of Christ and of the Holy Ghost, are never called heretics by any writer of the first three centuries; and this circumstance is surely a strong proof that the doctrine of the Trinity was the doctrine of the primitive Church; more especially, since the names of those who first denied the Divinity of Christ and of the Holy Ghost, are transmitted to us as of persons who dissented from the common faith of Christians.

But while we contend that the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity is founded in Scripture, and supported by the authority of the early Christians, we must acknowledge that it is not given to man to understand in what manner the three persons are united, or how, separately and jointly, they are God. It would, perhaps, have been well if divines, in treating this awful and mysterious subject, had confined themselves to the expressions of Scripture; for the moment we begin to explain it beyond the written word of God, we plunge ourselves into inextricable difficulties. And how can it be otherwise? Is it to be expected that our finite understandings should be competent to the full comprehension of the nature and properties of an infinite Being? "Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" Job xi. 7; or penetrate into the essence of the Most High? "God is a Spirit," John iv. 24, and our gross conceptions are but ill-adapted to the contemplation of a pure and spiritual Being. We know not the essence of our own mind, nor the precise distinction of its several faculties; and why then should we hope to comprehend the personal characters which exist in the Godhead? "If I tell you earthly things, and you understand them not, how shall ye understand if I tell you heavenly things?" When we attempt to investigate the nature of the Deity, whose existence is commensurate with eternity, by whose power the universe was created, and by whose wisdom it is governed; whose presence fills all space, and whose knowledge extends to the thoughts of every man in every age, and to the events of all places, past, present, and to come, the mind is quickly lost in the vastness of these ideas, and, unable to find any sure guide to direct its progress, it becomes, at every step, more bewildered and entangled in the endless mazes of metaphysical abstraction. "God is a God that hideth himself." "Canst thou by searching find out God?" "Behold, God is great, and we know him not." Job xxiii. 9; xi. 7; xxxvi. 26. "Such knowledge is too wonderful and excellent for us; it is high: we cannot attain unto it." Ps. cxxxix. 6. It is for us, simply, and in that docile spirit which becomes us, to receive the testimony of God as to himself, and to fix ourselves upon that firmest of all foundations, and most rational of all evidence, "Thus saith the Lord."

[TRINITY, FRATERNITY OF THE. An order identified by Mosheim with the "Brethren of the Redemption of Captives," instituted in the twelfth century by John de Matha and Felix de Valvis, in honor of the Trinity, and for the redemption of Christians from the Mohammedans—one-third of their revenue being devoted to this purpose. They are called "Order of Asses," because they rode on asses, not being allowed to ride on horses; and "Mathurins," from a chapel dedicated to St. Mathurin, in a place in Paris where they had their monastery. Their original austerity has been considerably mitigated.]

[TRINITY SUNDAY. This day was originally considered an octave of Pentecost, no particular day being thought necessary for the celebration of this mystery, which was celebrated every day. Its universal observance, as a distinct feast, cannot be traced, according to Boniface XIV., higher than 1334; though in some places, according to Durandus, it seems to have been kept as far back as 834.]

[TRISAGION. Ter Sanctus. See CHERUBICAL HYMN.]

[TRITHEISTS. Followers of John Ascusnage, a Monophysite and Syrian philosopher of the sixth century. They held that there are in the Deity three equal natures, or substances, united by no common essence. The sect was divided into two parties. See CONISTS and PHILOPONISTS.]

TRIUMPHS, MILITARY The Hebrews, under the direction of inspired prophets, celebrated their victories by triumphal processions, the women and children dancing, and playing upon musical instruments, and singing hymns and songs of triumph to the living and true God. The song of Moses at the Red Sea, which was sung by Miriam and the women of Israel to the dulcet beat of the timbrel, is a majestic example of the triumphal hymns of the ancient Hebrews. The song of Deborah and Barak, after the decisive battle in which Sisera lost his life, and Jabin his dominion over the tribes of Israel, is a production of the same sort, in which the spirit of genuine heroism and of true religion are admirably combined. But the song which the women of Israel chanted when they went out to meet Saul and his victorious army, after the death of Goliath and the discomfiture of the Philistines, possesses somewhat of a different character, turning chiefly on the valorous exploits of Saul and the youthful champion of Israel: "And it came to pass, as they came, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, that the women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet King Saul with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music; and the women answered one another as they played, and said, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands." 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7. But the most remarkable festivity, perhaps, on the records of history, was celebrated by Jehoshaphat, the King of Judah, in a succeeding age. When that religious prince led forth his army to battle against a powerful confederacy of his neighbors, he appointed a band of sacred music to march in front, praising the beauty of holiness as they went before the army, "and to say, Praise the Lord, for his mercy endureth for ever." After the discomfiture of their enemies, he assembled his army in the valley of Berachah, near the scene of victory, where they resumed the anthem of religious praise: "Then they returned, every man of Judah and Jerusalem, and Jehoshaphat in the forefront of them, to go again to Jerusalem with joy; for the Lord had made them to rejoice over their enemies. And they came to Jerusalem with psalteries, and harps, and trumpets, unto the house of the Lord." 2 Chron. xx. 21-28. Instead of celebrating his own heroism, or the valor of his troops, on this memorable occasion, that excellent prince sang with his whole army the praises of the Lord of hosts, who disposes of the victory according to his pleasure. This conduct was becoming the descendant and successor of David, the man according to God's own heart, and a religious people, the peculiar inheritance of Jehovah.

The Roman conquerors used to carry branches of palm in their hands when they went in triumph to the capitol; and sometimes wore the toga palmata, a garment with the figures of palm trees upon it, which were interwoven in the fabric. In the same triumphant attitude, the Apostle John beheld in vision those who had overcome by the blood of the Lamb, standing "before the throne, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands." Rev. vii. 9. The highest military honor which could be obtained in the Roman state, was a triumph, or solemn procession, in which a victorious general and his army advanced through the city to the capitol. He set out from the Campus Martius, and proceeded along the Via Triumphalis, and from thence through the most public places of the city. The streets were strewed with flowers, and the altars smoked with incense. First went a numerous band of music, singing and playing triumphal songs; next were led the oxen to be sacrificed, having their horns gilt, and their heads adorned with fillets and garlands; then, in carriages, were brought the spoils taken from the enemy; also golden crowns sent by the allied and tributary states. The titles of the vanquished nations were inscribed on wooden frames; and images or representations of the conquered countries and cities were exhibited. The captive leaders followed in chains, with their children and attendants; after the captives came the lictors, having their faces wreathed with laurel, followed by a great company of musicians and dancers, dressed like satyrs, and wearing crowns of gold; in the midst of whom was a pantomime, clothed in a female garb, whose business it was, with his looks and gestures, to insult the vanquished; a long train of persons followed, carrying perfumes; after them came the general, dressed in purple, embroidered with gold, with a crown of laurel on his head, a branch of laurel in his right hand, and in his left an ivory sceptre, with an eagle on the top, his face painted with vermillion, and a golden ball hanging from his neck on his breast; he stood upright in a gilded chariot, adorned with ivory, and drawn by four white horses, attended by his relations, and a great crowd of citizens, all in white. His children rode in the chariot along with him; his lieutenants and military tribunes, commonly by his side. After the general followed the consuls and senators, on foot; and the whole procession was closed by the victorious army drawn up in order, crowned with laurel, and decorated with the gifts which they had received for their valor, singing their own and their general's praises. The triumphal procession was not confined to the Romans; the Greeks had a similar custom; for the conquerors used to make a procession through the middle of their city, crowned with garlands, repeating hymns and songs, and brandishing their spears; the captives followed in chains, and all their spoils were exposed to public view.

The great Apostle of the Gentiles alludes to these splendid triumphal scenes in his Epistle to the Ephesians, where he mentions the glorious ascension of his Redeemer into heaven: "When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men." Eph. iv. 8. These words are a quotation from the sixty-eighth Psalm, where David in spirit describes the ascension of Messiah in very glowing colors: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them, as in Sinai, in the holy place. Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive," or an immense number of captives; "thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also; that the Lord God might dwell among them. Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with his benefits, even the God of our salvation. Selah." Ps. lxxviii. 17-19. Knowing the deep impression which such an allusion is calculated to make on the mind of a people familiarly acquainted with triumphal scenes, the apostle returns to it in his Epistle to the Colossians, which was written about the same time: "Having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it." Col. ii. 15. After obtaining a complete victory over all his enemies, he ascended in splendor and triumph into his Father's presence on the clouds of heaven, the chariots of the Most High, thousands of holy angels attending in his train; he led the devil and all his angels, together with sin, the world, and death, as his spoils of war, and captives in chains, and exposed them to open contempt and shame, in the view of all his angelic attendants, triumphing like a glorious conqueror over them, in virtue of his cross, upon which he made complete satisfaction for sin, and by his own strength, without the assistance of any creature, destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil. And as mighty princes were accustomed to scatter largesses among the people, and reward their companions in arms with a liberal hand, when, laden with the spoils of vanquished nations, they returned in triumph to their capital; so the Conqueror of death and hell, when he ascended far above all heavens, and sat down in the midst of the throne, shed forth blessings of his grace and Holy Spirit upon people of every tongue and of every nation.

The officers and soldiers, also, were rewarded according to their merit. Among the Romans, the noblest reward which a soldier could receive was the crown, made of leaves. Alluding to this high distinction, the apostle says to his son Timothy, "I have fought a good fight: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. And lest any one should imagine that the Christian's crown is perishable in its nature, and soon fades away, like a crown of oak leaves, the Apostle Peter assures the faithful soldier of Christ that his crown is infinitely more valuable and lasting: "Ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." 1 Peter v. 4. And this account is confirmed by St. James: "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him." James i. 12. The military crowns were conferred by the general in presence of his army; and such as received them, after a public eulogium on their valor, were placed next his person. The Christian also receives his unmerited reward from the hand of the Captain of his salvation: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Rev. ii. 10. And, like the brave veteran of ancient times, he is promoted to a place near his Lord: "To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. iii. 21.

TROAS, a city of Phrygia, or of Mysia, upon the Hellespont, having the old city of Troy to the north, and that of Assos to the south. Sometimes the name of Troas is put for the province, wherein the city of Troy stood. St. Paul was at Troas when he had the vision of the Macedonian inviting him to come and preach in that kingdom. Acts xvi. 8. Besides this, the apostle was several times at Troas; but we know nothing particular of his transactions there. Acts xx. 5, 6; 2 Cor. ii. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 13.

[TROGYLIUM. See SAMOS.]

TROPHIMUS, a disciple of St. Paul, and an Ephesian by birth. He came from Ephesus to Corinth with the apostle, and kept him company in his whole journey from Corinth to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, Acts xx. 4. When St. Paul was in the temple there, the Jews laid hold of him, crying out, "Men of Israel, help: this is the man that teacheth all men everywhere against the people, and the law, and this place; and further, brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place." Acts xxi. 28, 29. And this they said, because certain Jews of Ephesus having seen Trophimus with St. Paul in the city, whom they looked upon as a Gentile, imagined that St. Paul had introduced him into the temple. The whole city was immediately in an uproar, and St. Paul was secured. Trophimus afterward accompanied St. Paul; for that apostle writes to Timothy, that he had left Trophimus sick at Miletus. 2 Tim. iv. 20.

TRUMPET. The Lord commanded Moses to make two trumpets of beaten silver, to be employed in calling the people together when they were to decamp. Num. x. 2, 3, etc. They also chiefly made use of these trumpets, to proclaim the beginning of the civil year, the beginning of the Sabbatical year, and the beginning of the jubilee. Lev. xxv. 9, 10. Josephus says that these trumpets were near a cubit long; and had a tube, or pipe, of the thickness of a common flute. Their mouths were only wide enough to be blown into, and their ends were like those of a modern trumpet. At first there were but two in the camp, but afterward a greater number were made. Even in the time of Joshua there were seven of them. Joshua vi. 4. At the dedication of the temple of Solomon, sixscore priests sounded as many trumpets. 2 Chron. v. 12. Besides the sacred trumpets of the temple, the use of which was restrained to the priests only, in war there were others, which the generals sometimes employed for gathering their troops together. For example, Ehud sounded the trumpet, to assemble the Israelites against the Moabites, who oppressed them, and whose king Eglon he had lately slain. Judg. iii. 27. Gideon took a trumpet in his hand, and gave every one of his people one, when he assaulted the Midianites. Judges vii. 8, 16. Joab sounded the trumpet, to give the signal of retreat to his soldiers, in the battle against those of Abner's party, and in that against Absalom; and lastly, in the pursuit of Sheba, the son of Bichri. 2 Sam. ii. 28; xviii. 16; xx. 22. The feast of trumpets was kept on the first day of the seventh month of the sacred year, the first of the civil year. See MUSIC.

TRUTH is used, 1. In opposition to falsehood, lies, or deceit, Prov. xii. 17, etc. 2. It signifies fidelity, sincerity, and punctuality in keeping promises; and to truth taken in this sense is generally joined mercy or kindness, as in Gen. xxiv. 27, and other places of Scripture. 3. Truth is put for the true doctrine of the gospel, Galatians iii. 1. 4. Truth is put for the substance of the types and ceremonies of the law, John i. 17. [Comp. John xiv. 6.]

[TRYPHENA and TRYPHOSA. Christian women at Rome, mentioned Rom. xvi. 12.]

TUBAL, the fifth son of Japheth. The Scripture commonly joins together Tubal and Meshech, which makes it thought that they peopled countries bordering upon each other. The Chaldee interpreters, by Tubal and Meshech, understand Italy and Asia, or rather Ausonia. Josephus accounts them to be Iberia and Cappadocia. St. Jerome affirms that Tubal represents the Spaniards, heretofore called Iberians. Bochart is very copious in proving, that by Meshech and Tubal are intended the Muscovites and the Tiberians. [See MESHECH.]

TUBAL-CAIN, or THUBAL-CAIN, son of Lamech the bigamous, and of Zillah, Gen. ix. 29. The Scriptures tell us that he was the father and inventor, or master, of the art of forging and managing iron, and of making all kinds of iron-work. There is great reason to believe that this was the Vulcan of the heathens.

[TURLUPINS. See BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT.]

TURTLE, תור, תרנגול, Gen. xv. 9: Lev. i. 14; v. 7, 11; xii. 6, 8; xiv. 22, 30; xv. 14, 29; Num. vi. 10: Psalm lxxiv. 19: Cant. ii. 12: Jer. viii. 7: תרנגול, Luke ii. 24. We have the authority of the Septuagint, the Targum, and of all the ancient interpreters, for understanding this of the turtle. Indeed, it is one of those evident instances in which the name of the bird is by onomatopœia formed from its note or cry. The turtle is mentioned among migratory birds by Jeremiah, viii. 7, and in this sense differs from the rest of its family, which are all stationary. The fact to which the prophet alludes is attested by Aristotle in these words: "The pigeon and the dove are always present, but the turtle only in summer; that bird is not seen in winter." And in another part of his work, he asserts that the dove remains, while the turtle migrates. Varro, and other ancient writers, make the like statement. Thus Solomon, Cant. ii. 12, mentions the return of this bird as one of the indications of spring: "The voice of the turtle is heard in our land." See DOVE.

TYCHICUS, a disciple of St. Paul, whom the Apostle often employed to carry his letters to the several Churches. He was of the province of Asia, and accompanied St. Paul when, in A. D. 58, he made his journey from Corinth to Jerusalem. Acts xx. 4. It was he that carried the Epistle to the Colossians, that to the Ephesians, and the First to Timothy. St. Paul did not send him merely to carry his letters, but also to learn the state of the Churches, and to bring him an account of them. Wherefore he calls him his dear brother, a faithful minister of the Lord, and his companion in the service of God. Eph. vi. 21, 22: Col. iv. 7, 8. He had thoughts also of sending him into Crete, to preside over that Church in the absence of Titus, iii. 12.

TYPE. This word is not frequently used in Scripture; but what it signifies is supposed to be very frequently implied. We usually consider a type as an example, pattern, or general similitude to a person, event, or thing which is to come; and in this it differs from a representation, memorial, or commemoration of an event, etc., which is past. The Spirit of God has adopted a variety of means to indicate his perfect foreknowledge of all events, and his power to control them. This is sometimes declared by express verbal prophecy; sometimes by specific actions performed by Divine command; and sometimes by those peculiar events, in the lives of individuals, and the history or religious observances of the Israelites, which were caused to bear a designed reference to some parts of the gospel history. The main point, says Chevallier, in an inquiry into these historical types, is to establish the fact of a preconcerted connection between the two series of events. No similarity, in itself, is sufficient to prove such a correspondence. Even those recorded in Scripture are recorded under very different circumstances. If the first event be declared to be typical at the time when it occurs, and the second correspond with the prediction so delivered, there can be no doubt that the correspondence was designed. If, before the occurrence of the second event, there be delivered a distinct prophecy that it will happen, and will correspond with some previous event, the fulfilment of the prophecy furnishes an intrinsic proof that the person who gave it spake by Divine inspiration. It may not, from this fact, follow that the two events were connected by a design formed before either of them occurred; but it certainly does follow that the second event, in some measure, had respect to the first; and that whatever degree of connection was, by such a prophet, assumed to exist, did really exist. If, again, no specific declaration be made respecting the typical character of any event or person, until after the second event has occurred, which is then declared to have been prefigured, the fact of preconcerted connection will rest solely upon the authority of the person who advances the assertion. But, if we know, from other sources, that his words are the words of truth, our only inquiry will be, if he either distinctly asserts, or plainly infers, the existence of a designed correspondence. The fact, then, of a preconcerted connection between two series of events, is capable of being established in three ways; and the historical types may be accordingly arranged in three principal divisions. Some of them afford intrinsic evidence that the Scriptures, which record them, are given by inspiration of God; the others can be proved to exist only by assuming that fact; but all when once established, display the astonishing power and wisdom of God, and the importance of that scheme of redemption which was ushered into the world with such magnificent preparations. In contemplating this wonderful system, we discern one great intention interwoven, not only into the verbal prophecies and extraordinary events of the history of the Israelites, but into the ordinary transactions of the lives of selected individuals, even from the creation of the world. Adam was "the figure of him that was to come." Romans v. 14. Melchisedec was "made like unto the Son of God." Heb. vii. 3. Abraham, in the course of events in which he was engaged by the especial command of Heaven, was enabled to see Christ's day, John viii. 56; and Isaac was received from the dead "in a figure." Heb. xi. 19. At a later period, the paschal lamb was ordained to be sacrificed, not only as a memorial of the immediate deliverance which it was instituted to procure and to commemorate, but also as a continued memorial of that which was to be "fulfilled in the kingdom of God." Luke xxii. 16. Moses was raised up to deliver the people of Israel; to be to them a lawgiver, a prophet, a priest; and to possess the regal authority if not the title of king. But, during the early period of his life, he was himself taught that one great prophet should be raised up like unto him; before his death he delivered the same prophecy to the people; and, after that event, the Israelites continually looked for that faithful prophet, who should return answer to their inquiries. 1 Macc. iv. 46; xiv. 41. Their prophets all pointed to some greater lawgiver, who should introduce a new law into their hearts, and inscribe it upon their minds. Jer. xxxi. 33. The whole people of Israel were also made, in some instances, designedly representative of Christ; and the events which occurred in their national history, distinctly referred to him. During their wanderings in the wilderness, God left not himself without witness, which should bear reference to the great scheme of the gospel. They ate spiritual meat. It was an emblem of the true bread of life, which came down from heaven. John vi. 32. "They drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ." 1 Cor. x. 4. They were destroyed of serpents; and a brazen serpent was lifted up on a pole, that whosoever looked might live. It was a sensible figure of the Son of man, who was in like manner to be lifted up; "that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." John iii. 15. Besides, their religious ordinances were only "a figure for the time then present." Heb. ix. 9. Their tabernacle was made after the pattern of heavenly things, Heb. viii. 5: Exod. xxv. 9, 40; and was intended to prefigure the "greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands." Heb. ix. 11. The high-priest was a living representative of the great "High-Priest of our profession," Heb. iii. 1; and the Levitical sacrifices plainly had respect to the one great sacrifice for sins. Joshua the son of Nun represented Jesus in name; and by his earthly conquests in some measure prefigured the heavenly triumphs of his Lord. In a subsequent period, David was no indistinct type of "the Messiah the Prince," Dan. ix. 25, for a long time humbled, and at length triumphant over his enemies. And the peaceable dominion of Solomon prefigured that eternal rest and peace which remaineth to the people of God. In a still later age, the miraculous preservation of the prophet Jonah displayed a sign, which was fulfilled in the resurrection of Christ. And when the temple was rebuilt, Joshua, the son of Josedech, the high-priest, and his fellows, were set forth as "men of sign," representatives of the Branch, which should, in the fulness of time, be raised up to the stem of Jesse. Zech. iii. 8: Isa. xi. 1. The illustration, then, to be derived from the historical types of the Old Testament, is found diffused over the whole period which extends from the creation of the world to the time when vision and prophecy were sealed. And all the light, which emanates from so many various points, is concentrated in the person of Christ.

TYRANNUS. It is said in Acts xix. 9, that St. Paul being at Ephesus, and seeing that the Jews to whom he preached, instead of being converted, were rather more hardened and obstinate, withdrew from their society, nor went to preach in their synagogue, but taught every day in the school of one Tyrannus. It is inquired, Who was this Tyrannus? Some think him to have been a prince or great lord, who accommodated the apostle with his house, in which to receive and instruct his disciples. But the generality conclude that Tyrannus was a converted Gentile, a friend of St. Paul, to whom he withdrew.

TYRE, or TYRUS, was a famous city of Phenicia. Its Hebrew name is צֵר or צָר, which signifies a rock. The city of Tyre was allotted to the tribe of Asher, Joshua xix. 29, with the other maritime cities of the same coast; but it does not appear that the Asherites ever drove out the Canaanites. Isaiah, xxiii. 12, calls Tyre the daughter of Sidon, that is, a colony from it. Homer never speaks of Tyre, but only of Sidon. Josephus says that Tyre was built not above two hundred and forty years before the temple of Solomon; which would be in A. M. 2760, two hundred years after Joshua. Tyre was twofold, insular and continental. Insular Tyre was certainly the most ancient; for this it was which was noticed by Joshua: the continental city, however, as being more commodiously situated, first grew into consideration, and assumed the name of Palætyrus, or Old Tyre. Want of sufficient attention to this distinction has embarrassed both the Tyrian chronology and geography. Insular Tyre was confined to a small rocky island, eight hundred paces long, and four hundred broad, and could never exceed two miles in circumference. But Tyre on the opposite coast, about half a mile from the sea, was a city of vast extent, since, many centuries after its demolition by Nebuchadnezzar, the scattered ruins measured nineteen miles round, as we learn from Pliny and Strabo. Of these, the most curious and surprising are the cisterns of Roselayne, designed to supply the city with water; of which there are three still entire, about one or two furlongs from the sea, so well described by Maundrell, for their curious construction and solid masonry. Old Tyre withstood the mighty Assyrian power, having been besieged in vain, by Shalmaneser, for five years; although he cut off their supplies of water from the cisterns; which they remedied by digging wells within the city. It afterward held out thirteen years against Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, and was at length taken; but not until the Tyrians had removed their effects to the insular town, and left nothing but the bare walls to the victor, which he demolished. What completed the destruction of the city was, that Alexander afterward made use of these materials to build a prodigious causeway, or isthmus, above half a mile long, to the insular city, which revived, as the phoenix, from the ashes of the old, and grew to great power and opulence, as a maritime state; and which he stormed after a most obstinate siege of five months. Pococke observes, that "there are no signs of the ancient city; and as it is a sandy shore, the face of every thing is altered, and the great aqueduct is in many parts almost buried in the sand." Thus has been fulfilled the prophecy of Ezekiel: "Thou shalt be built no more: though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again." Ezek. xxvi. 21. The fate of insular Tyre has been no less remarkable. When Alexander stormed the city, he set fire to it. This circumstance was foretold. "Tyre did build herself a strong hold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets. Behold, the Lord will cast her out, and he will smite her power in the sea, and she shall be devoured with fire." Zech. ix. 3, 4. After this terrible calamity, Tyre again retrieved her losses. Only eighteen years after, she had recovered such a share of her ancient commerce and opulence, as enabled her to stand a siege of fourteen months against Antigonus, before he could reduce the city; but after this, Tyre fell alternately under the dominion of the kings of Syria and Egypt, and then of the Romans, until it was taken by the Saracens, about A. D. 639, retaken by the Crusaders, A. D. 1124; and at length sacked and razed by the Mamelukes of Egypt, with Sidon and other strong towns, that they might no longer harbor the Christians, A. D. 1289.

The final desolation of Tyre was thus foretold: "I will scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock: it shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea; for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God." "I will make thee like the top of a rock: thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon: thou shalt be built no more; for I the Lord have spoken it, saith the Lord God." Nothing can be more literally and astonishingly executed than this sentence. Hue-tius relates of one Hadrianus Parvillerius, that "when he approached the ruins of Tyre, and beheld the rocks stretched forth to the sea, and the great stones scattered up and down on the shore, made clean and smooth by the sun and waves and wind, and useful only for the drying of fishermen's nets, many of which happened at the time to be spread thereon, it brought to his memory the prophecy of Ezekiel concerning Tyre, that such should be its fate." Maundrell, who visited the Holy Land, A. D. 1697, describes it thus:

"This city, standing in the sea upon a peninsula, promises, at a distance, something very magnificent; but when you come to it, you find no similitude of that glory for which it was so renowned in ancient times, and which the prophet Ezekiel describes, xxvi., xxvii., xxviii. On the north side it has an old Turkish ungarrisoned castle, beside which you see nothing here but a mere Babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, etc.; there being not so much as one entire house left! Its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches harboring themselves in the vaults, and subsisting chiefly by fishing, who seem to be preserved in this place by Divine Providence as a visible argument how God has fulfilled his word concerning Tyre, namely, that it should be as the top of a rock, a place for fishers to dry their nets upon. Ezek. xxvi. 14." Hasselquist, who saw it since, in A. D. 1751, observes as follows: "None of those cities which were formerly famous are so totally ruined as Tyre, now called Zur, except Troy. Zur now scarcely can be called a miserable village, though it was formerly Tyre, the queen of the sea. Here are about ten inhabitants, Turks and Christians, who live by fishing." Bruce, who visited this country about eighty years after Maundrell, says, that "passing by Tyre from curiosity, I came to be a mournful witness of the truth of that prophecy, that Tyre, the queen of nations, should be a rock for fishers to dry their nets on." Mr. Buckingham, who visited it in 1816, represents it as containing about eight hundred substantial stone-built houses, and from five to eight thousand inhabitants. But Mr. Jowett, on the authority of the Greek archbishop, reduces this number to less than four thousand; namely, one thousand two hundred Greek Catholics, one hundred Maronites, one hundred Greeks, one thousand Montonalis, and one hundred Turks. Mr. Jowett observed numerous and beautiful columns stretched along the beach, or standing in fragments half buried in the sand, that has been accumulating for ages: "The broken aqueduct, and the ruins which appear in its neighborhood, exist as an affecting monument of the fragile and transitory nature of earthly grandeur." Mr. Joliffe states, that there now exist scarcely any traces of this once powerful city. "Some miserable cabins, ranged in irregular lines, dignified with the name of streets, and a few buildings of a rather better description, occupied by the officers of government, compose nearly the whole of the town. It still makes, indeed, some languishing efforts at commerce, and contrives to export annually to Alexandria cargoes of silk and tobacco, but the amount merits no consideration. The noble dust of Alexander, traced by the imagination till found stopping a beer-barrel, would scarcely afford a stronger contrast of grandeur and debasement, than Tyre, at the period of being besieged by that conqueror, and the modern town of Tsour erected on its ashes."

As commercial cities, says Mansford, ancient Alexandria and London may be considered as approaching the nearest to Tyre. But Alexandria, during the whole of her prosperous days, was subject to foreign rule; and London, great as are her commerce and her wealth, and possessing as she does almost a monopoly of what has in all ages been the most enviable and most lucrative branch of trade, that with the east, does not centre in herself, as Tyre did, without a rival and without competition, the trade of all nations, and hold an absolute monopoly, not of one, but of every branch of commerce. For the long period of a thousand years, not a single production of the east passed to the west, or of the west to the east, but by the merchants of Tyre. Nor for many ages were any ships found but those of Tyre daring enough to pass the straits of the Red Sea on one side, or of the Mediterranean on the other. While the vessels of other countries were groping along their coasts, clinging to their landmarks, and frightened at a breeze, the ships of Tyre were found from Spain, if not from Britain, on the west, to the coast of Malabar and Sofala on the east and south. No wonder that her merchants were princes, and that they lived in a style of magnificence unknown in any other country in the same age; or that she should be considered a desirable prey by the conquerors of the times. But enterprise and wealth did not alone complete the character of the Tyrians: they had an undoubted claim to valor of no common order. Their city, which possessed scarcely any territory beyond their own walls, maintained a siege of thirteen years (the longest in history except that of Ashdod) against the whole power of Babylon; and another of seven months against Alexander, whose successes had afforded no instance of similar delay. And in neither case had the captors much to boast of, as the Tyrians had shipped off their most valuable property to Carthage; and in the former particularly, as has been already related, they so effectually secured or sacrificed the whole, that the soldiers of Nebuchadnezzar found nothing to reward them for their length of labor, during which, by excessive toil and heat, "their heads were made bald, and their very shoulders peeled," but vacant streets and houses already sacked. Carthage, Utica, and Cadiz, are celebrated monuments of the power of Tyre on the Mediterranean, and in the west. She extended her navigation even into the ocean, and carried her commerce beyond England to the north, and the Canaries to the south. Her connections with the east, though less known, were not less considerable: the islands of Tyros and Aradus, (the modern Barhain,) in the Persian Gulf; the cities of Faran and Phœnicum Oppidum, on the Red Sea, in ruins even in the time of the Greeks, prove that the Tyrians had long frequented the coast of Arabia and the Indian Sea. But through the vicissitudes of time, Tyre, reduced to a miserable village, has no other trade than the exportation of a few sacks of corn and raw cotton, nor any merchant, says Volney, but a single Greek factor in the service of the French Saide, (Sidon,) who scarcely takes sufficient profit to maintain his family. In allusion to Tyre in her better days, Forbes observes, when speaking of Surat, "The bazars, filled with costly merchandise; picturesque and interesting groups of natives on elephants, camels, horses, and mules; strangers from all parts of the globe, in their respective costume; vessels building on the stocks, others navigating the river; together with Turks, Persians, and Armenians, on Arabian chargers, European ladies in splendid carriages, the Asiatic females in hackeries drawn by oxen; and the motley appearance of the English and nabob's troops on the fortifications, remind us of the following description of Tyre: 'O thou that art situate at the entry of the sea, which art a merchant of the people for many isles,' etc. Ezek. xxvii. 3. This is a true picture of oriental commerce in ancient times; and a very exact description of the port and the bazars of Surat at the present day."

Dr. Vincent has given the following able illustration of the trade of Tyre as described in Ezek. xxvii., which must be considered as one of the most ample and early accounts extant. The learned author has rendered the Hebrew names into others better known in the geography of more recent times:—Tyre produced from Hermon, and the mountains near it, fir for planking, and from Libanus cedars for masts. From Bashan, east of the Sea of Galilee, oaks for oars. From Greece, or the Grecian isles, ivory to adorn the benches or the waists of the galleys. From Egypt, linen, ornamented with different colors, for sails, or flags, or ensigns. From Peloponnesus, blue and purple cloths for awnings. From Sidon and Aradus, mariners; but Tyre itself furnished pilots and commanders. From Gebal, or Biblos, on the coast between Tropolis and Berytus, caulkers. From Persia and Africa, mercenary troops. From Aradus, the troops that garrisoned Tyre with the Gamadim. From Tarsishish, or by distant voyages toward the west, and toward the east, great wealth, iron, tin, lead, and silver. Tin implies Britain or Spain, or at least a voyage beyond the Straits of Hercules. From Greece and the countries bordering on Pontus, slaves and brass-ware. From Armenia, horses, horsemen, and mules. From the Gulf of Persia, and the isles within that gulf, horns (tusks) of ivory, and ebony. The export to these isles was the manufacture of Tyre. From Syria, emeralds, purple, brodered work, fine linen, coral, and agate. The exports to Syria were the manufactures of Tyre in great quantities. From Judah and Israel the finest wheat, honey, oil, and balsam. From Damascus, wine of Chalybon, (the country bordering on the modern Aleppo,) and wool in the fleece. The exports to Damascus were costly and various manufactures. From the tribe of Dan, situated nearest to the Philistines, the produce of Arabia, bright or wrought iron, cassia or cinnamon, and the calamus aromaticus. In conducting the transport of these articles, Dan went to and fro; that is, formed or conducted the caravans. By one interpretation, they are said to come from Uzal; and Uzal is said to be Sana, the capital of Yemen, or Arabia Felix. From the Gulf of Persia, rich cloth for the decoration of chariots or horsemen. From Arabia Petræa and Hedjaz, lambs, and rams, and goats. From Sabea and Oman, the best of spices. From India, gold and precious stones. From Mesopotamia, from Carrhæ, and Babylonia, the Assyrians brought all sorts of exquisite things; that is, fine manufacture, blue cloth, and brodered work, or fabric of various colors in chests of cedar, bound with cords, containing rich apparel.

If these articles were obtained farther from the east, may they not be the fabrics of India, first brought to Assyria by the Gulf of Persia, or by caravans from Carmania and the Indus, and then conveyed by the Assyrians, in other caravans, to Tyre and Syria? In this view, the care of package, the chests of cedar, and the cording of the chests, are all correspondent to the nature of such a transport. From Tarshish the ships came that rejoiced in the markets of Tyre: they replenished the city and made it glorious in the midst of the sea. Ezek. xxvii. 5-25. Dr. Vincent observes, that from the Tarshish last mentioned the ships returned to the ports in the Red Sea; as from the nineteenth to the twenty-fourth verse every particular relates to the east, while that referred to in the twelfth implies the west—Spain, or beyond. We have here some light thrown on the obscurity which surrounds the situation of this distant and unknown place. There is, indeed, a clear reference to two distinct places, or parts of the world, denominated Tarshish; perhaps from those very circumstances, their distance, and the little that was known respecting them. That one was situated westward, and reached by a passage across the Mediterranean, is certain from other parts of Scripture; that the other was eastward, or southward, on the coast of Arabia, India, or Africa, is equally certain. See TARSHISH and OPHIR.

[Bayard Taylor, who visited Tyre in 1852, says, "The plain, back of the narrow, sandy promontory on which the modern Scor is built, is a rich black loam, which a little proper culture would turn into a very garden. It helped me to account for the wealth of ancient Tyre. The remains of the sea wall are still to be traced for the entire circuit of the city, and the heavy surf breaks upon piles of shattered granite columns. Along a sort of mole, protecting an inner harbor on the north side, are great numbers of these columns. I counted fifteen in one group, some of them fine red granite, and some of the marble of Lebanon. The Arabs, in digging among the sand-hills for the stones of the old buildings, which they quarry out and ship to Beyrout, come upon chambers, pillars, arches, and other objects. The Tyrian purple is still furnished by a muscle found upon the coast, but Tyre is now only noted for its tobacco and millstones. There were half a dozen small coasting-vessels lying in the road, but the old harbors are entirely destroyed. Isaiah's prophecy is literally fulfilled: 'Howl, ye ships of Tarshish; for it is laid waste, so that there is no house, no entering in.'" Dr. Olin says, "I counted not less than two hundred columns, entire or mutilated, scattered over the site of the ancient city, chiefly along the old wall. These are unquestionable remains of the ancient Tyre, and their number and sumptuousness are well calculated to fill us with lofty ideas of the grandeur and wealth of the former mistress of the sea. The massiveness of the stones employed in building the sea wall is, I think, pretty conclusive evidence that this noble bulwark belongs to the early days of Tyrian commerce. The modern walls extend only on two sides of the town, the sea answering instead of artificial ramparts on the north and west. The harbor is evidently filling up with sand. The facility of obtaining building materials from the field of ruins, and some advantages of fishing, were probably the chief inducements for reviving this poor shadow of Tyre." Robinson, who visited it in 1838 and 1852, says, "The houses are for the most part mere hovels—the streets narrow lanes, crooked and filthy. The taxable men in 1838 were four hundred Mohammedans and three hundred Christians, implying a population of less than three thousand. Of the Christians very few are of the Greek rite, the great body being Greek Catholics. The latter have a resident bishop, while the bishop of the former, who is under the patriarch of Antioch, resides at Hâsbeiya. We heard here of no Jews. The earthquake of 1837 was felt here to a very considerable extent. Sûr is supplied with water from two deep fountains a few paces outside of the gate, on the north side of the peninsula. This is a singular place for fresh water to spring up, and the conjecture is not unnatural, that they stand in some unknown connection with the ancient fountains of Râs-el-'Ain. Such was the belief of our host. He related that, some two or three years ago, the governor of Sûr having been ordered to furnish a certain number of recruits as soldiers, collected all the peasantry of the district under the pretence of clearing out the ancient aqueduct, which was supposed to have come to the city. They actually dug for a day or two along the isthmus, not far from the gate, and found traces of an aqueduct at some depth under ground, consisting of very large and thick tubes of pottery. The governor now seized his recruits, and the matter was dropped. A question arises in regard to the site of the earliest land city, Palatyrus, of which no known vestige now remains. The only distinct notice we have of its position is from Strabo, three centuries after its destruction by Alexander. He says it stood thirty stadia south of the insular city. Both the direction and distance carry it to the vicinity of Râs-el-'Ain. It probably lay on the south of those fountains along the coast; and the hill in that quarter may have been its citadel." Stanley, who visited it in 1854, says, "A large part of the island, that is, what was the island before Alexander joined it to the shore by the present long sandy isthmus, lies bare and uninhabited, fragments of columns lying heaped and tangled together in the waves, huge walls of an ancient castle, and also of the old cathedral. In this last lie the bones of the great Emperor Frederic Barbarossa, beside the dust of a yet greater man, Origen. The name of Tyre, Tzur, which, in all probability, led the Greeks to transfer the appellation of this their first acquaintance to the whole land of Syria, points to its inseparable connection with the rugged shoal of rock (tzur) on which its island-sanctuary was first reared. In this respect Tyre was a fit type of the ancient Queen of Commerce. Situated not merely on a promontory, like all the other Phœnician cities, but on a sea-girt rock, she might well be regarded as a floating palace, as a ship moored by the long strand 'in the midst of the seas,' with her 'masts of cedar,' her 'sails of fine linen, blue and purple,' her 'mariners, rowers, and pilots.' Ezek. xxxvii.]"

[UBIQUITARIANS. A sect in Germany, deriving its name from the notion that the body of Christ possesses ubiquity. This seems to be involved in the doctrine of consubstantiation; though Brentius, who asserted it, was opposed by Melancthon and other Lutherans. In 1577, a formulary of faith, of which this tenet was the basis, was drawn up by Smidelin, Selneccer, Musculus, Chemnitius, Chytræus, and Cornærus. The party was soon divided—some asserting that Christ's humanity was omnipresent when he was on earth, and others dating his ubiquity from the time of his ascension to heaven.]

[UCKEWALLISTS. Followers of Ucke Wallès, an ignorant Anabaptist, or Mennonite, of Friesland, who taught, A. D. 1637, that the sins committed by the Jews in the period between the birth of Christ and the day of Pentecost were in a great measure excusable, on account of the ignorance which then prevailed; accordingly, Judas and the murderers of Christ may have been saved.]

[ULAI. Dan. viii. 2. This river, known as the Euleus, is identified by some with the Kuran, which unites with the Dizful, the ancient Cophrates; but it is generally considered the Choraspes, the modern Kerah, which falls into the united streams of the Euphrates and Tigris. Shushan was on this river. Its waters are clear and pure, and the kings of Persia drank of no other. They took it with them in their expeditions: it was boiled, deposited in vessels of silver, and transported in four-wheeled carriages drawn by mules.]

UNBELIEF or INFIDELITY is a want of credence in the word of God; or it may be defined, a calling in question the Divine veracity, in what God hath either testified, promised, or threatened; and thus it is the opposite of faith, which consists in crediting what God hath said. John iii. 18, 33. It is said that the Jews could not enter into the promised land, "because of their unbelief." Heb. iii. 18, 19. And the apostle, teaching the believing Hebrews what instruction they should deduce from that portion of the history of their forefathers, says, as the words literally translated would run, "We are evangelized as well as they were; but the word which they heard did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." Heb. iv. 2. The meaning is, We Christians are favored with the good news of the heavenly rest, as well as Israel in the wilderness were with the good news of the earthly rest in Canaan; but the word which they heard concerning that rest did not profit them, because they did not believe it. Hence it appears that faith and unbelief are not confined to the spiritual truths and promises of the gospel of Christ, but respect any truth which God may reveal, or any promise which he may make even concerning temporal things. It is a crediting or discrediting God in what he says, whatever be the subject. Christ could not do many mighty works in his own country, because of their unbelief, Matt. vi. 5, 6: their mean opinion of him, and contempt of his miracles, rendered them unfit objects to have miracles wrought upon or among them. The apostles' distrust of Christ's promises of enabling them to cast out devils rendered them incapable of casting one out, Matt. xvii. 16; and St. Peter's distrust of his Master's power occasioned his sinking in the water. Matt. xiv. 30, 31. The unbelief for which the Jews were broken off from their being a Church was their denial of Christ's Messiahship, their contempt and refusal of him, and their violent persecution of his cause and members. Rom. xi. 20.

Adverting to the infidelity which prevailed among the educated class of heathens when Christianity first appeared in the world, Dr. Neander observes:—"It was Christianity which first presented religion under the form of objective truth, as a system of doctrines perfectly independent of all individual conceptions of man's imagination, and calculated to meet the moral and religious wants of man's nature, and in that nature everywhere to find some point on which it might attach itself. The religions of antiquity, on the contrary, consist of many elements of various kinds, which, either by the skill of the first promulgator, or, in the length of years, by the impress of national peculiarities, were moulded together into one whole. By the transmission of tales, half mythical and half historical, by forms and statutes bearing the impress of religious feelings or ideas, mingled with multifarious poems, which showed a powerful imaginative spirit, rugged indeed, or, if animated by the spirit of beauty, at least devoid of that of holiness—all these varied materials were interwoven so completely into all the characters, customs, and relations of social life, that the religious matter could no longer be separated from the mixed mass, nor be disentangled from the individual nature of the life and political character of each people with which it was interwoven. There was no religion generally adapted to human nature, only religions fitted to each people. The Divinity appeared here, not as free and elevated above nature; not as that which, overruling nature, might form and illuminate the nature of man; but was lowered to the level of nature, and made subservient to it. Through this principle of deifying the powers of nature, by which every exertion of bare power, even though immoral, might be received among the objects of religious veneration, the idea of holiness which beams forth from man's conscience must continually have been thrown into the background and overshadowed. The old lawgivers were well aware how closely the maintenance of an individual state religion depends on the maintenance of the individual character of the people, and their civil and domestic virtues. They were well aware that when once this union is dissolved, no power can restore it again. Therefore we find, especially in Rome, where politics were the ruling passion, a watchfulness after the most punctilious observance of traditional religious ceremonies, and jealous aversion to any innovations in religion. The belief of a Divine origin of all existence is a first principle in man's nature, and he is irresistibly impelled to ascend from many to One. This very feeling showed itself even in the polytheism of national religions, under the idea of a highest God, or a father of the gods. Among those who gave themselves up to the consideration of Divine things, and to reflection upon them, this idea of an original unity must have been more clearly recognized, and must have formed the centre-point of all their inward religious life and thought. The imagination of the people was to be engaged with the numerous powers and energies flowing forth from that one highest Being, while to the contemplation of that unity, only a small number of exalted spirits, the initiated leaders of the multitude, could elevate themselves. The one God was the God of philosophers alone. The ruling opinion of all the thinking men of antiquity, from which all religious legislation proceeded, was, that pure religious truth could not be proposed to the multitude, but only such a mixture of fiction, poetry, and truth, as would serve to represent religious notions in such a manner that they might make an impression on men, whose only guide was their senses. The principle of a so-called fraus pia [pious fraud] was prevalent in all the legislation of antiquity. But how miserable would be the case of mankind, if the higher bond, connecting human affairs with heaven, could only be united by means of lies; if lies were necessary in order to restrain the greater portion of mankind from evil! And what could their religion in such a case effect? It could not impart holy dispositions to the inward heart of man; it could only restrain the open outbreaking of evil that existed in the heart, by the power of fear. Falsehood, which cannot be arbitrarily imposed on human nature, would never have been able to obtain this influence, had not a truth, which is sure to make itself felt by human nature, been working through it—had not the belief in an unseen God, on whom man universally feels himself dependent, and to whom he feels himself attracted—had not the impulse toward an invisible world, which is implanted in the human heart—been able to work also through this covering of superstition. The geographer Strabo thinks that, in the same manner that mythical tales and fables are needful for children, so also they are necessary for the uneducated and uninformed, who are in some sort children, and also for those who are half educated; for even with them reason is not sufficiently powerful, and they are not able to free themselves from the habits they have acquired as children. This is, indeed, a sad condition of humanity, when the seed of holiness, which can develop itself only in the whole course of a life, cannot be strewn in the heart of the child, and when mature reason must destroy that which was planted in the early years of infancy! when holy truth cannot form the foundation of the future development of life from the earliest dawn of childish consciousness! The thinking Roman statesmen also of the time at which Christianity appeared, as Varro, for instance, distinguish between the theologia philosophica [philosophical theology] and the theologia civilis, [civil theology,] which contradicts the principles of the former, as Cotta in Cicero distinguished between the belief of Cotta and the belief of the Pontifex. The philosopher required in religion a persuasion grounded on reasoning: the citizen, the statesman, followed the tradition of his ancestors without inquiry. Suppose now this theologia civilis and this theologia philosophica to proceed together, without a man's wishing to set the opposition between the two in a very clear light to himself; that the citizen and the statesman, the philosopher and the man, could be united in the same individual with contradictory sentiments, (a division which in the same man is very unnatural,) and then he would perhaps say, "Philosophical reason conducts to a different result from that which is established by the state religion; but the latter has in its favor the good fortune which the state has enjoyed in the exercise of religion handed down from our ancestors. Let us follow experience even where we do not thoroughly understand." Thus speaks Cotta, and thus also many Romans of education in his time, either more or less explicitly. Or perhaps we may suppose that men openly expressed this contradiction, and did not scruple to assign the pure truth to the theologia philosophica, and to declare the theologia civilis only a matter of politics. In the east, which is less subject to commotions, where tranquil habits of life were more common, and where a mystical spirit of contemplation, accompanying and spiritualizing the symbolical religion of the people, was more prevalent than an intellectual cultivation opposed to it, and developing itself independently, it was possible that this kind of esoteric and exoteric religion should proceed hand in hand without change for many centuries. But it was otherwise with the more stirring spirits and habits of the west. Here this independently proceeding development of the intellect must have been at open war with the religion of the people; and as intellectual culture spread itself more widely, so also must a disbelief of the popular religion have been more extensively diffused; and, in consequence of the intercourse between the people and the educated classes, this disbelief must also have found its way at last among the people themselves; more especially since, as this perception of the nothingness of the popular religion spread itself more widely, there would naturally be many who would not, with the precaution of the men of old, hide their new illumination from the multitude, but would think themselves bound to procure for it new adherents, without any regard to the injury of which they might be laying the foundations, without inquiring of themselves whether they had any thing to offer to the people in the room of that of which they robbed them; in the room of their then source of tranquillity under the storms of life, instead of that which taught them moderation under affliction; and, lastly, in the place of their then counterpoise against the power of wild desires and passions. Men saw, in the religious systems of different nations which then came into contact with each other in the enormous empire of Rome, nothing but utter contradiction and opposition. The philosophical systems also exhibited nothing but opposition of sentiments, and left those who could see in the moral consciousness no criterion of truth, to doubt whether there were any such thing or not. In this sense, as representing the opinions of many eminent and cultivated Romans, with a sneer at all desire for truth, Pilate made the sarcastic inquiry, "What is truth?" Many contented themselves with a shallow, lifeless deism, which usually takes its rise where the thirst after a living union with heaven is wanting; a system which, although it denies not the existence of a God, yet drives it as far into the background as possible—a listless God! who suffers every thing to take its own course, so that all belief in any inward connection between this Divinity and man, any communication of this Divinity to man, would seem to this system fancy and enthusiasm! The world and human nature remain at least free from God. This belief in God, if we can call it a belief, remains dead and fruitless, exercising no influence over the life of man. The belief in God here produced neither the desire after that ideal perfection of holiness, the contemplation of which shows at the same time to man the corruption of his own nature, so opposite to that holiness; nor that consciousness of guilt by which man, contemplating the holiness of God within him, feels himself estranged from God; nor does this belief impart any lively power of sanctification. Man is not struck by the inquiry, "How shall I, unclean as I am, approach the holy God, and stand before him, when he judges me according to the holy law which he has himself engraven on my conscience? What shall I do to become free from the guilt which oppresses me, and again to attain to communion with him?" To make inquiries such as these, this spirit of deism considers as fanaticism; and it casts away from itself all notions of God's anger, judgments, or punishments, as representations arising only from the limited nature of the human understanding. More lively and penetrating spirits, who felt in the world an infinite Spirit which animated all things, fell into an error of quite an opposite nature to this deism, which removed God too far from the world: namely, into a pantheism, which confused God and the world, which was just as little calculated to bestow tranquillity and consolation. They conceived God only as the infinite Being elevated above frail man, and not as being connected with him, attracting him to himself, and lowering himself down to him. It was only the greatness, not the holiness nor the love of God which filled their souls. Yet the history of all ages proves that man cannot for any length of time disown the desire for religion implanted in his nature. Whenever man, entirely devoted to the world, has for a long time wholly overwhelmed the perception of the Divinity which exists in his nature, and has long entirely estranged himself from Divine things, these at last prevail over humanity with greater force. Man feels that something is wanting to his heart, which can be replaced to him by nothing else; he feels a hollowness within him which can never be satisfied by earthly things, and can find satisfaction and blessing sited to his condition in the Divinity alone, and an irresistible desire impels him to seek again his lost connection with heaven. The times of the dominion of superstition also, as history teaches us, are always times of earthly calamity; for the moral corruption which accompanies superstition necessarily, also destroys all the foundations of earthly prosperity. Thus the times in which superstition extended itself among the Romans were those of the downfall of civil freedom, and of public suffering under cruel despots. But, however, the consequences of these evils conducted man, also, to their remedy; for by distress from without man is brought to the consciousness of his own weakness, and his dependence on a higher than earthly power; and when he is forsaken by human help, he is compelled to seek it here. Man becomes induced to look upon his misfortunes as the punishments of a higher Being, and to seek for means by which he may secure again for himself the favor of that Being. The need of a connection with Heaven, from which man felt himself estranged, and dissatisfaction with the cold and joyless present, obtained a more ready belief for the picture which mythology presented, of a golden age, when gods and men lived together in intimate union; and warm imaginations looked back on such a state with longing and desire. This belief and this desire, it must be owned, were founded on a great truth which man could rightly apprehend only through Christianity; and this desire was a kind of intimation which pointed to Christianity. From the nature of the case, however, it is clear that a fanatical zeal, where the heat of passion concealed from man the hollowness and falsehood of his faith, might be created for a religion to which man only betook himself as a refuge in his misery, and in his dread of the abyss of unbelief; a religion which no longer served for the development of man's nature, and into which, nevertheless, he felt himself driven back from the want of any other; and that men must use every kind of power and art to uphold that which was in danger of falling from its own internal weakness, and to defend that which was unable to defend itself by its own power. Fanaticism was therefore obliged to avail itself of every kind of power in the struggle with Christianity in order to uphold heathenism, which was fast sinking by its own weakness. Although the Romans had from the oldest times been noted for their repugnance to all foreign sorts of religious worship, yet this trait of the old Roman character had with many altogether disappeared. Because the old national temples of the Romans had lost their respect, in many dispositions man was inclined to bring in to their assistance foreign modes of worship. Those which obtained the readiest admission were such as consisted of mysterious, symbolical customs, and striking, sounding forms. As is always the case, men looked for some special and higher power in what is dark and mysterious. The very simplicity of Christianity became therefore a ground of hatred to it.

[UNCTION. See ANOINT and EXTREME UNCTION.]

[UNIATES, UNITED GREEKS. At the Synod of Brest-Litofsky in 1596, under the auspices of Sigismund III., and headed by the Metropolitan of Kieff, many who had adhered to the Greek faith in Galicia, Hungary, Poland, and Little Russia, submitted to the pope, rejecting the Filioque and retaining the Slavonic language and ritual in their worship. These were called Uniates, or United Greeks. A few years since, the

Uniates of Little Russia, about two millions, returned to the Russo-Greek Church: there are still some three millions and a half of them, principally in the Austrian dominions.]

UNICORN, ראם, Num. xxiii. 22; xxiv. 8: Deut. xxxiii. 17; Job xxxix. 9, 10; Psalm xxii. 21; xxix. 6; xcii. 10; Isa. xxxiv. 7. In each of these places it is rendered in the Septuagint μονόκερως, except in Isaiah, where it is ἀρρὸς, the great or mighty ones. Barrow, in his "Travels in Southern Africa," has given a drawing of the head of the unicorn, "a beast with a single horn projecting from the forehead;" accompanied with such details as, he thinks, offer strong arguments for the existence of such animals in the country of the Bosjesmans. He observes that this creature is represented as a "solid ungulous animal resembling a horse, with an elegantly shaped body, marked from the shoulders to the flanks with longitudinal stripes or bands." Still he acknowledges that the animal to which the writer of the book of Job, who was no mean natural historian, makes a poetical allusion, has been supposed, with great plausibility, to be the one-horned rhinoceros; and that Moses also very probably meant the rhinoceros, when he mentions the unicorn as having the strength of God.

"There are two animals," says Bruce, "named frequently in Scripture, without naturalists being agreed what they are. The one is the behemoth, the other the reem; both mentioned as types of strength, courage, and independence on man; and, as such, exempted from the ordinary lot of beasts, to be subdued by him, or reduced under his dominion. The behemoth, then, I take to be the elephant; his history is well known, and my only business is with the reem, which I suppose to be the rhinoceros. The derivation of this word, both in the Hebrew and Ethiopic, seems to be from erectness, or standing straight. This is certainly no particular quality in the animal itself, which is not more nor even so much erect as many other quadrupeds, for its knees are rather crooked; but it is from the circumstance and manner in which his horn is placed. The horns of all other animals are inclined to some degree of parallelism with the nose, or os frontis, [front bone.] The horn of the rhinoceros alone is erect and perpendicular to this bone, on which it stands at right angles; thereby possessing a greater purchase of power, as a lever, than any horn could possibly have in any other position. This situation of the horn is very happily alluded to in the sacred writings: 'My horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a reem.' Psalm xcii. 10. And the horn here alluded to is not wholly figurative, but was really an ornament worn by great men in the days of victory, preferment, or rejoicing, when they were anointed with new, sweet, or fresh oil; a circumstance which David joins with that of erecting the horn. Balaam, a priest of Midian, and so in the neighborhood of the haunts of the rhinoceros, and intimately connected with Ethiopia—for they themselves were shepherds of that country—in a transport, from contemplating the strength of Israel, whom he was brought to curse, says that they had as it were the strength of the reem. Num. xxiii. 22. Job, xxxix. 9, 10, makes frequent allusion to his great strength, ferocity, and indocility. Isaiah, xxxiv. 7, who of all the prophets seems to have known Egypt and Ethiopia the best, when prophesying about the destruction of Idumea, says that the reem shall come down with the fat cattle: a proof that he knew his habitation was in the neighborhood. In the same manner as when foretelling the desolation of Egypt, he mentions, as one manner of effecting it, the bringing down the fly from Ethiopia, Isa. vii. 18, 19, to meet the cattle in the desert and among the bushes, and destroy them there, where that insect did not ordinarily come but on command, Exodus viii. 22, and where the cattle fled every year, to save themselves from that insect.

"The rhinoceros in Geez is called arwé harish, and in the Amharic auraris, both which names signify the large wild beast with the horn. This would seem as if applied to the species that had but one horn, The Ethiopic text renders the word reem, arwé harish, and this the Septuagint translates μονόκερως, or unicorn. If the Abyssinian rhinoceros had invariably two horns, it seems to me improbable the Septuagint would call him μονόκερως, especially as they must have seen an animal of this kind exposed at Alexandria in their time, when first mentioned in history, at an exhibition given to Ptolemy Philadelphus, at his accession to the crown, before the death of his father. The principal reason for translating the word reem unicorn, and not rhinoceros, is from a prejudice that he must have but one horn. But this is by no means so well founded, as to be admitted as the only argument for establishing the existence of an animal which never has appeared after the search of so many ages. Scripture speaks of the horns of the unicorn, Deut. xxxiii. 17: Ps. xxii. 21; so that even from this circumstance the reem may be the rhinoceros as the rhinoceros may be the unicorn."

In the book of Job, xxxix. 9, 10, the reem is represented as an unmanageable animal, which, although possessed of sufficient strength to labor, sternly and pertinaciously refused to bend his neck to the yoke.

Will the reem submit to serve thee?
Will he, indeed, abide at thy crib?
Canst thou make his harness bind the reem to the furrow?
Will he, forsooth, plough up the valleys for thee?
Will thou rely on him for his great strength,
And commit thy labor unto him?
Wilt thou trust him that he may bring home thy grain,
And gather in thy harvest?

The rhinoceros, in size, is only exceeded by the elephant; and in strength and power is inferior to no other creature. He is at least twelve feet in length, from the extremity of the snout to the insertion of the tail; six or seven feet in height, and the circumference of the body is nearly equal to its length. He is particularly distinguished from the elephant and all other animals by the remarkable and offensive weapon he carries upon his nose. This is a very hard horn, solid throughout, directed forward, and has been seen four feet in length. Mr. Browne, in his Travels, says that the Arabians call the rhinoceros abu-kurn, "father of the one horn." The rhinoceros is very hurtful, by the prodigious devastation which he makes in the fields.

This circumstance peculiarly illustrates the passage from Job. Instead of trusting him to bring home the grain, the husbandman will endeavor to prevent his entry into the fields, and hinder his destructive ravages. In a note upon this passage, Mr. Goode says, "The original reem, by all the older translators rendered rhinoceros, or unicorn, is by some modern writers supposed to be the bubalus, bison, or wild ox. There can be no doubt that rhinoceros is the proper term; for this animal is universally known in Arabia by the name of reem, to the present day." The rhinoceros, though next in size, yet in docility and ingenuity greatly inferior, to the elephant, has never yet been tamed, so as to assist the labors of mankind, or to appear in the ranks of war. The rhinoceros is perfectly indocile and untractable, though neither ferocious nor carnivorous. He is among large animals what the hog is among smaller ones, brutal and insensible; fond of wallowing in the mire, and delighting in moist and marshy situations near the banks of rivers. He is, however, of a pacific disposition; and, as he feeds on vegetables, has few occasions for conflict. He neither disturbs the less, nor fears the greater, beasts of the forest, but lives amicably with all. He subsists principally on large succulent plants, prickly shrubs, and the branches of trees; and lives to the age of seventy or eighty years.

[Dr. Robinson identifies the reem with the jāmās, the buffalo, found in Egypt, Palestine, and Italy; but that animal is "kept both for milk and for labor." Kitto and others contend for the oryx, or urus, the rim of the Arabs, erroneously called the wild ox. The horns of a stag of this species spring close to each other from the middle of the forehead, so that if one of them were broken off, he would look like an animal naturally one-horned: in the Egyptian monuments he usually appears as if he had but one horn. The unicorn described by Pliny, Ver-tomanus, and others, is supposed to have had no more real existence than the heraldic monster.]

[UNIFORMITY, ACT OF. An Act of the English Parliament, (1 Eliz., and 13, 14, Car. II.,) by which an observance of the Liturgy, etc., is enforced by severe penalties; which were relaxed in favor of Dissenters by the Act of Toleration, 1689, and by an act passed 1828. See Burnet, Neal, and the article TEST-ACT.]

[UNIGENITUS, THE BULL. A bull, beginning with the words, Unigenitus Dei Filius, issued in 1713, by Clement XI., against Pasquier Quesnel's "Moral Reflections on the New Testament." The pope had highly eulogized this work, but, as it was a Jansenist production, the Jesuits, through Louis XIV., secured its condemnation. The pope extracted from it one hundred and one propositions, which he denounced as "false, captious, scandalous, pernicious, rash, seditious, impious, blasphemous, schismatical, and heretical." Some of them are tinged with Jansenist errors, but others of them are true, e. g.: "The reading of the Sacred Scriptures is for all." "The obscurity of the sacred word is no reason for laymen to dispense themselves from reading it." "The Lord's day ought to be sanctified by Christians for works of piety, and above all for the reading of the Sacred Scripture. It is damnable to wish to withdraw a Christian from this reading." The Jansenists, and also the Cardinal Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, appealed from the pope to a general council, but they had finally to submit; and, in spite of the "Gallican Liberties," "a parliamentary registration of the bull was procured by menaces of removal or of exile"—which was the fate of many of the Jansenists. This bull, and that called In Cœnia Domini, were effaced from the German missals by the Emperor Joseph II.]

UNITARIANS, a comprehensive term, including all who believe the Deity to subsist in one person only. The chief article in the religious system of the Unitarians is that Christ was a mere man. But they consider him as the great instrument in the hands of God of reversing all the effects of the fall; as the object of all the prophecies from Moses to his own time; as the great bond of union to virtuous and good men, who, as Christians, make one body in a peculiar sense. The Socinian creed was reduced to what Dr. Priestley calls Humanitarianism, by denying the miraculous conception, the infallibility, and the impeccability of the Saviour; and, consequently, his right to any Divine honors or religious worship. As to those texts which declare that Jesus Christ "knew no sin," etc., his followers explain them in the sense in which it is said of believers, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin." 1 John iii. 9. Or, if this be not satisfactory, Dr. Priestley refers us to the "Theological Repository," "in which," he says, "I think I have shown that the Apostle Paul often reasons inconclusively; and, therefore, that he wrote as any other person of his turn of mind or thinking, and in his situation, would have written, without any particular inspiration. Facts, such as I think I have there alleged, are stubborn things, and all hypotheses must be accommodated to them." Nor is this sentiment peculiar to Dr. Priestley. Mr. Belsham says, "The Unitarian doctrine is, that Jesus of Nazareth was a man constituted in all respects like other men, subject to the same infirmities, the same ignorance, prejudices, and frailties; descended from the family of David, the son of Joseph and Mary, though some indeed still adhere to the popular opinion of the miraculous conception; that he was born in low circumstances, having no peculiar advantages of education or learning, but that he was a man of exemplary character; and that, in conformity to ancient prophecy, he was chosen and appointed by God to introduce a new moral dispensation into the world, the design of which was to abolish the Jewish economy, and to place believing Gentiles upon an equal ground of privilege and favor with the posterity of Abraham; in other words, he was authorized to reveal to all mankind, without distinction, the great doctrine of a future life, in which men shall be rewarded according to their works." Mr. Belsham goes on to state the Unitarian opinion to be, that Jesus was not conscious of his high character till after his baptism; that he afterward spent some time in the wilderness, where he was invested with miraculous powers, and favored with heavenly visions, like St. Paul, 2 Cor. xii., in which he supposed himself taken up into heaven, and in consequence of which he speaks of his descent from heaven; that he exercised his ministry on earth for the space of a year or more, and then suffered death upon the cross, not to exhibit the evil of sin, or in any sense to make atonement for it, but as a martyr to the truth, and as a necessary preliminary to his resurrection, which they consider as a pledge of the resurrection of mankind. Many also believe that Jesus maintained some personal and sensible connection with the Church during the apostolic age, and the continuance of miraculous powers in the Church. They further believe that he is appointed to revisit the earth, and to judge the world—a difficult task, one would suppose, if “he be constituted,” as said above, “in all respects like other men, subject to the same ignorance, prejudices, frailties,” etc.! So this blasphemous system contains, in this respect, and in almost every other, its own refutation. See SOCINIANS.

The creed which the celebrated Council of Nice established, says Grier, in his “Epitome of General Councils,” is that which Christians now profess; the errors and impieties which it condemned are those which, according to the refinements of Socinus, his followers of the present day have moulded into their antichristian system. Arius, a presbyter in the Church of Alexandria, a man of consummate talent and address, but of a cold and speculative mind, impiously maintained that there had been a time when the Son of God was not; that he was capable of virtue and vice; and that he was a creature, and mutable as creatures are! It is true that Arius held a qualified preëxistence, when he said that God created the Son from nothing before he created the world; in other words, that the Son was the first of created beings; but such preëxistence does not imply coëxistence or coëternity with the Father. After this manner did he deny the Divinity of the Son, and his coëternity with the Father. Seduced by the pride of reasoning, no less than by his fondness for novelty, did he likewise reject the ὁμοούσιον, as it is called, or the tenet of the Son being of the same substance with the Father. The blasphemies of Arius consisted in the denial of Christ's being either coëternal or consubstantial with God. After a lapse of twelve centuries, Socinus lowered him another step by declaring his inferiority to the Father; for that he, as well as all other things, was subject to the supreme Creator of the universe; and although he held his mere humanity, yet, inconsistently enough, he would offer him Divine worship! Inconsistently it may be said, because the Socinian, on his own principles, thereby incurs the guilt of idolatry as much as the Roman Catholic who worships the Virgin Mary, a mere created being. The Unitarian, or Humanitarian, sinks the character of the Saviour still lower, by withholding all worship from him; and while he considers him as a mere man, and therefore as not possessing the attributes of the Deity, with an inconsistency as singular as that of Socinus, he acknowledges his Divinity so as to call him God; as if the terms Deity and Divinity bore different significations, or as if the principle which constituted the essence of the Godhead were separable from the Godhead itself! It should be observed, that the lowest denomination of unbelievers in the descending scale, namely, the modern Unitarian, combines with his own peculiar errors and impieties all the errors and impieties of both Arius and Socinus, together with an absolute denial of the Holy Ghost being a Divine person. Having touched on the shades of difference which exist between the followers of Arius and Socinus, a more minute detail of the division and subdivision of the classes into which they may be ranged may not be unacceptable to the reader: Arians and semi-Arians constituted the original distinction; that of a subsequent day was high and low Arians. The high Arians entertain the highest views of the mediatorial influence of Christ, and believe in the entire Scriptures; the low Arians run into the opposite extreme, yet neither high nor low Arians consider Christ to be truly God. The old Socinians admitted the miraculous conception, and the worship of the Son; the modern Socinians do not; a circumstance that identifies the modern Socinian with the Unitarian. Some high Arians, such as Dr. Samuel Clarke, etc., thought that Christ might be worshipped; others of them affect to have no distinct notion of what the Holy Ghost meant, and to believe that worship is not to be addressed to Christ, but through Christ! These variations in the Unitarian creed have been deduced from the evidence of Unitarians themselves, given before the Commissioners of Education Inquiry in Ireland in 1826, as detailed in their report to Parliament; a circumstance that renders them the more valuable, as it imparts to them a living, speaking authority. It must, however, be observed, that, motley as they are, they all terminate in one point, the rejection of Christ's Divinity; and that, diversified as the distinctions appear to be, they all will be ultimately found to be without a shadow of difference. In short, Arians, Socinians, Unitarians, etc., not only agree with each other in their antichristian scheme, but can scarcely be said to differ from the infidel Mussulmans, who are taught by their Koran to regard Christ as a great prophet, and the forerunner of their own. With Deism doubtless Unitarianism has an intimate alliance. For Deists reject all the doctrines of the Christian revelation, while Unitarians reject all its peculiar doctrines: 1. The Trinity of persons in the Godhead. 2. The Divinity of Christ. 3. The personality of the Holy Spirit. 4. The miraculous birth of Christ. 5. The atonement of Christ. 6. The sanctification of the Spirit. 7. The existence of angels and spirits; 8. And, therefore, of the devil and his angels. “In what, then,” says the learned Dr. Burgess, Bishop of Salisbury, after this enumeration of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, “does Unitarianism differ from Deism? Deists deny the essential doctrines of Christianity by rejecting the whole of the Christian revelation: Unitarians reject the Christian revelation by denying all its peculiar and essential doctrines.” [Unitarianism has very extensively leavened the Protestant Churches of Germany; its leading principles having been adopted by many besides the Neologists. The Reformed Churches of Switzerland and France, in their revulsion from Calvinism, have also to a great extent embraced this system. The Presbyterians in England went over to Unitarianism in the beginning of the eighteenth century. The Census of 1851, reported to the Registrar-General, says: "The ancient Presbyterian chapels and endowments have, in great degree, become the property of Unitarians, whose origin, as a distinct community in England, may be dated from the first occurrence of such virtual transfers, namely, from about the period just subsequent to 1780. They were excepted from the benefits of the Toleration Act until 1813, when the section in that statute which affected them was abrogated. The form of government adopted by them is substantially Congregational. Returns have been received at the Census Office from two hundred and twenty-nine congregations connected with this body"—many of which are very small. Besides these there are ninety-three "General Baptist" congregations in England and Wales, which are also Unitarian. There are several Unitarian Presbyteries in the north of Ireland, besides isolated congregations of this type, of which there are also many in Scotland and in the British colonies. The Congregationalists of New England gradually exchanged Calvinism for Unitarianism, in the latter part of the last century and the beginning of the present. In 1818, a majority of the inhabitants of the parish with which the First Church in Dedham, Mass., was connected, chose a Unitarian for their pastor, but the majority of the church refused to receive him. A lawsuit ensued, which, in 1821, was decided by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in favor of the Unitarian party, establishing the principle that those who act with the majority of the parish are the church, and have a right to the funds. Since then many houses of worship, etc., have been transferred to the Unitarians, who report in their "Year-Book for 1857," two hundred and eighty-seven clergymen, seventy-four of whom have no particular charge. They are located for the most part in New England, though they are of late extending into the Western and North-western States. They are actively engaged in the spread of their principles by means of Book, Tract, Missionary, Sunday-school, and other societies. They have a "Divinity School" at Cambridge, Mass., and a "Theological School" at Meadville, Pa., and various periodicals. Many of the New England Unitarians have embraced the Transcendentalism of the German Neologists. Besides the Congregationalists who have embraced Unitarianism, there are other bodies that agree with them in the leading features of that system. See CHRISTIANS and UNIVERSALISTS.]

[UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. See PRESBYTERIANS and SECEDERS.]

UNIVERSALISTS. Those who believe that Christ so died for all, that, before he shall have delivered up his mediatorial kingdom, all fallen creatures shall be brought to a participation of the benefits of his death, in their restoration to holiness and happiness. They are called also Universal Restorationists, and their doctrine the doctrine of universal restoration. Some of its friends have maintained it, also, under the name of universal salvation; but perhaps the former name is that by which it should be distinguished; for the Universalists do not hold any universal exemption from future punishment, but merely the recovery of all those that shall have been exposed to it. They have likewise a just claim to this title on other grounds; for their doctrine, which includes the restoration, or "restitution of all the intelligent offspring of God," or of all "lapsed intelligences," seems to embrace even the fallen angels. They admit the reality and equity of future punishment; but they contend that it will be corrective in its nature, and limited in its duration. They teach the doctrine of election, but not in the exclusive Calvinistic sense of it. They suppose that God has chosen some for the good of all; and that his final purpose toward all is intimated by his calling his elect the first-born and the first-fruits of his creatures, which, say they, implies other branches of his family, and a future ingathering of the harvest of mankind. They teach, also, that the righteous shall have part in the first resurrection, shall be blessed and happy, and be made priests and kings to God and to Christ in the millennial kingdom, and that over them the second death shall have no power; that the wicked will receive a punishment apportioned to their crimes; that punishment itself is a mediatorial work, and founded upon mercy, and, consequently, that it is a means of humbling, subduing, and finally reconciling the sinner to God. They add, that the words rendered "eternal," "everlasting," "for ever," and for ever and ever," in the Scriptures, are frequently used to express the duration of things that have ended or must end; and if it is contended that these words are sometimes used to express proper eternity, they answer, that then the subject with which the words are connected must determine the sense of them; and as there is nothing in the nature of future punishment which can be offered as a reason why it should be endless, they infer that the above words ought always to be taken in a limited sense when connected with the infliction of misery.

Those who deny the eternity of future punishments have not formed themselves into any separate body or distinct society, but are to be found in most Christian countries, and among several denominations. Their doctrines form part of the creed of some Arians, as of Mr. Whiston; of many Deists, as of Mr. Hobbes, Mr. Tindal, etc.; and of most Socinians. Nor need we be surprised that libertines and atheists hold it, and that they strive to bring others over to their opinion. "The tyranny of priests," said Dupont the atheist, in the national convention, December, 1792, "extends their opinion to another life, of which they have no other idea than that of eternal punishment; a doctrine which some men have hitherto had the good-nature to believe. But these prejudices must now fall: we must destroy them, or they will destroy us." The Mennonites in Holland have long held the doctrine of the Universalists; the people called Dunkers, or Tunkers, in America, descended from the German Baptists, hold it; and also the Shakers. Excellent refutations of this specious system have been published by the Rev. S. Jerram and the Rev. Daniel Isaac.

The Arminians are sometimes called "Universalists," on account of their holding the tenet of general redemption, in opposition to the Calvinists, who, from their specifically restricting the saving grace of God to certain foreordained individuals, receive the denomination of "Particularists." By the epithet "Hypothetical Universalists," are designated on the continent those who have adopted the theological system of Amyraut and Cameron, but who are better known in this country as "Baxterians." See AMYRALDISM, BAXTERIANISM, and CAMERONISTS.

[Universalism has generally advanced pari passu with Unitarianism. At the present time the abettors of the latter are for the most part favorable to the former, in some of its phases. This is the case not only in Europe, but also in the United States, where the Universalists and Unitarians have distinct organizations. The Rev. John Murray came from England to this country in 1770, and preached the doctrine of Restoration, which was embraced, in 1780, and ably advocated, by Elhanan Winchester, a Baptist minister of Philadelphia. About 1818, Hosea Ballou began to assert that all punishment is in this life; and this is now the prevalent form of Universalism, there being but about a dozen Restoration preachers and congregations in this country; whereas those who deny future punishment number six hundred and forty preachers, and eight hundred and twenty-eight churches, with a General Convention, organized in 1785, State Conventions, and local Associations. Their churches are generally small and severally independent. They have a university in Vermont, and several seminaries in other States. Some of this class of Universalists seem to be inclined to revert to the Restoration platform, being scarcely able to ignore the necessity of some punishment of the wicked in the future state. A form of Restorationism was taught by Origen and other fathers, but it was condemned by the fifth General Council, A. D. 553.]

[UNLEAVENED BREAD. The schoolmen say that unleavened bread was used in the eucharist until it was laid aside to discountenance the Judaizing errors of the Ebionites, after whose extinction the western Church returned to its use, and were hence called Azymites by the orientals, who have always used leavened bread. Bingham says the use of wafers and unleavened bread did not obtain till the eleventh century, when the oblations of common bread and wine began to be discontinued by the people; but "it is certain," says Riddle, "that from the seventh century unleavened bread was used at Rome, and leavened at Constantinople." The controversy respecting it (ἀπρομαχία) was originated by Michael Cerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople, A. D. 1053. Protestants have generally taken part with the Greeks on this question.]

[UPHARSIN. They are dividing: the plural of PERES, division, the u being the conjunction and prefixed. Dan. v. 25, 28. See BEL-SHAZZAR.]

UPPER ROOM. The principal rooms anciently in Judea were those above, as they are to this day at Aleppo, the ground-floor being chiefly made use of for their horses and servants. "The house in which I am at present living," says Jowett, "gives what seems to be a correct idea of the scene of Eutychus falling from the upper loft while St. Paul was preaching. Acts xx. 6-12. According to our idea of houses, the scene is very far from intelligible; and besides this, the circumstance of preaching generally leaves on the mind of cursory readers the notion of a church. To describe this house, which is not many miles distant from the Troad, and perhaps, from the unchanging character of oriental customs, nearly resembles the houses then built, will fully illustrate the narrative. On entering my host's door, we find the first floor entirely used as a store: it is filled with large barrels of oil, the produce of the rich country for many miles round. This space, so far from being habitable, is sometimes so dirty with the dripping of the oil, that it is difficult to pick out a clean footing from the door to the first step of the staircase. On ascending, we find the first floor, consisting of an humble suite of rooms, not very high: these are occupied by the family for their daily use. It is on the next story that all their expense is lavished: here my courteous host has appointed my lodging: beautiful curtains and mats, and cushions to the divan, display the respect with which they mean to receive their guest. Here, likewise, their splendor, being at the top of the house, is enjoyed by the poor Greeks with more retirement, and less chance of molestation from the intrusion of Turks: here, when the professors of the college waited upon me to pay their respects, they were received in ceremony, and sat at the window. The room is both higher and also larger than those below; it has two projecting windows; and the whole floor is so much extended in front beyond the lower part of the building, that the projecting windows considerably overhang the street. In such an upper room, secluded, spacious, and commodious, St. Paul was invited to preach his parting discourse. The divan, or raised seat, with mats or cushions, encircles the interior of each projecting window; and I have remarked that when the company is numerous, they sometimes place large cushions behind the company seated on the divan; so that a second tier of company, with their feet upon the seat of the divan, are sitting behind, higher than the front row. Eutychus, thus sitting, would be on a level with the open window; and, being overcome with sleep, he would easily fall out from the third loft of the house into the street, and be almost certain, from such a height, to lose his life. Thither St. Paul went down and comforted the alarmed company by bringing up Eutychus alive. It is noted that 'there were many lights in the upper chamber.' The very great plenty of oil in this neighborhood would enable them to afford many lamps; the heat of these and so much company would cause the drowsiness of Eutychus at that late hour, and be the occasion, likewise, of the windows being open."

[UR. The birthplace of Abraham. Gen. xi. 28, 31. Some think it was a district east of Chaldea, and as Ur means fire, or light, they think it denoted "the sun-rising province." It is generally considered a city, deriving its name from the fire-worship which there obtained, and identified with Edessa, now Orfah, in the north-western part of Osroëne, thirty miles from Haran, on the river Scirtus, now Daisan, which rises from a spring called Calirrhoë, whence Edessa was called Antiochia ad Calirrhoën. It was the capital of Osroëne. It was overthrown by an earthquake in the reign of Justin I., who rebuilt a portion of it, and called it Justinopolis. It is located on two declivities of a valley, is substantially built, has several mosques and Greek and Armenian churches, bazaars, manufactories of cotton goods, goldsmiths' wares, morocco leather, and it carries on considerable trade in corn, etc., with North Syria by way of Aleppo, and a transit trade with lower Mesopotamia. It has a population of thirty thousand Turks, Arabs, Greeks, Armenians, and Jews. "Ur of the Chaldees," says a recent traveller, "stands on a gently sloping plain, in the angle formed by the meeting of two mountain ranges, and is surrounded on all sides by extensive gardens and vineyards. Behind it rises a precipitous cliff, on which stands the castle, in tolerable repair, connected with the fortifications of the town by a turreted wall, which runs irregularly down the broken sides of the rock. Ruined Saracenic buildings cover nearly all earlier structures—a few Greek and Roman pillars and arches remain. The much-venerated pool of 'Sheikh, Ibraheem,' with its adjoining mosque and shady grove of cypresses, lies immediately below the citadel. That, with 'Job's Well' outside the walls, and two or three old Christian churches in ruins, or converted into mosques, reminds the wanderer that he stands upon ground probably once hallowed by the tread of patriarchs and apostles' feet." Some identify Ur with Warka, the "Erech" of Nimrod, (Gen. x. 10,) recently explored by W. K. Loftus. Sir Henry Rawlinson has deciphered on one of the bricks taken from a buttress at this place the name of a king called Uruk, who is supposed to have lived B. C. 2230. Many curious relics of high antiquity, including hundreds of coffins, have been dug out at Warka, an account of which is found in Loftus's "Travels and Researches in Chaldea and Susiana."]

[URIAH. Bathsheba's husband. 2 Sam. xi. xliii. 39.—Also, a priest. Isa. viii. 2. See UR-JAH.]

[URIAH. The high-priest who complied with the unlawful demand of Ahaz in the construction of an altar after a Syrian model. 2 Kings xvi. 10-16. The name is written Uriah in our version of Isaiah viii. 2.]

URIM AND THUMMIM. The high-priests of the Jews, we are told, consulted God in the most important affairs of their commonwealth, and received answers by the Urim and Thummim. What these were is disputed among the critics. Josephus, and some others, imagine the answer was returned by the stones of the breastplate appearing with an unusual lustre when it was favorable, or in the contrary case dim.

Others suppose that the Urim and Thummim were something enclosed between the folding of the breastplate; this some will have to be the tetragrammaton, or the word יהוה, Jehovah. Christophorus de Castro, and after him Dr. Spencer, maintain them to be two little images shut up in the doubling of the breastplate, which gave the oracular answer from thence by an articulate voice. Accordingly, they derive them from the Egyptians, who consulted their Iares, and had an oracle, or teraphim, which they called Truth. This opinion, however, has been sufficiently confuted by the learned Dr. Pococke and by Witsius. The more common opinion among Christians concerning the oracle by Urim and Thummim, and which Dr. Prideaux espouses, is, that when the high-priest appeared before the vail, clothed with his ephod and breastplate, to ask counsel of God, the answer was given with an audible voice from the mercy-seat, within the vail; but it has been observed, that this account will by no means agree with the history of David's consulting the oracle by Abiathar, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9, 11; xxx. 7, 8; because the ark, on which was the mercy-seat, was then at Kirjath-jearim; whereas David was in the one case at Ziklag, and in the other in the forest of Hareth. Braunius and Hottinger have adopted another opinion: they suppose that when Moses is commanded to put in the breastplate the Urim and Thummim, signifying lights and perfections in the plural number, it was meant that he should make choice of the most perfect set of stones, and have them so polished as to give the brightest lustre; and, on this hypothesis, the use of the Urim and Thummim, or of these exquisitely polished jewels, was only to be a symbol of the Divine presence, and of the light and perfection of the prophetic inspiration, and, as such, constantly to be worn by the high-priest in the exercise of his sacred function, especially in consulting the oracle.

Michaelis observes: That in making distributions of property, and in cases of disputes relative to meum [mine] and thuum, [thine,] recourse was had to the lot in default of any other means of decision, will naturally be supposed. The whole land was partitioned by lot; and that, in after-times, the lot continued to be used, even in courts of justice, we see from Prov. xvi. 33; xviii. 18; where we are expressly taught to remember that it is Providence which maketh the choice, and that therefore we ought to be satisfied with the decision of the lot, as the will of God. It was for judicial purposes, in a particular manner, that the sacred lot called Urim and Thummim was employed; and on this account the costly embroidered pouch, in which the priest carried this sacred lot on his breast, was called the judicial ornament. "But was this sacred lot used likewise in criminal trials?" Yes, says Michaelis, only to discover the guilty, to convict them; for in the only two instances of its use in such cases which occur in the whole Bible, namely, in Joshua vii. 14-18, 1 Sam. xiv. 37-45, we find the confessions of the two delinquents, Achan and Jonathan, annexed. It appears also to have been used only in the case of an oath being transgressed which the whole people had taken, or the leader of the host in their name, but not in the case of other crimes; for an unknown murder, for example, was not to be discovered by recourse to the sacred lot.

The inner sanctuary, within the veil of the tabernacle, observes Dr. Hales, or most holy place, was called the oracle, 1 Kings vi. 16, because there the Lord communed with Moses face to face, and gave him instructions in cases of legal difficulty or sudden emergency, Exod. xxv. 22: Num. vii. 89; ix. 8: Exod. xxxiii. 11; a high privilege granted to none of his successors. After the death of Moses a different mode was appointed for consulting the oracle by the high-priest, who put on "the breastplate of judgment," a principal part of the pontifical dress, on which were inscribed the words Urim and Thummim, emblematical of Divine illumination; as the inscription on his mitre, "Holiness to the Lord," was of sanctification. Exod. xxviii. 30-37: Lev. viii. 8. Thus prepared, he presented himself before the Lord to ask counsel on public matters, not in the inner sanctuary, which he presumed not to enter, except on the great day of national atonement, but without the veil, with his face toward the ark of the covenant, inside; and behind him, at some distance, without the sanctuary, stood Joshua, the judge, or person who wanted the response, which seems to have been given with an audible voice from within the veil, Num. xxvii. 21, as in the case of Joshua, vi. 6-15; of the Israelites during the civil war with Benjamin, Judges xx. 27, 28; on the appointment of Saul to be king, when he hid himself, 1 Sam. x. 22-24; of David, 1 Sam. xxii. 10; xxxiii. 2-12; xxx. 8: 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; of Saul, 1 Sam. xxviii. 6. This mode of consultation subsisted under the tabernacle erected by Moses in the wilderness, and until the building of Solomon's temple; after which we find no instances of it. The oracles of the Lord were thenceforth delivered by the prophets; as by Ahijah to Jeroboam, 1 Kings xi. 29; by Shemaiah to Rehoboam, 1 Kings xii. 22; by Elijah to Ahab, 1 Kings xvii. 1; xxi. 17-29; by Micaiah to Ahab and Jehoshaphat, 1 Kings xxii. 8; by Elisha to Jehoshaphat and Jehoram, 2 Kings iii. 11-14; by Isaiah to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix. 6-34; xx. 1-11; by Huldah to Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 13-20; by Jeremiah to Zedekiah, Jer. xxxii. 3-5, etc. After the Babylonish captivity, and the last of the prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the oracle ceased; but its revival was foretold by Ezra, (ii. 63,) and accomplished by Christ, who was himself the oracle, under the old and new covenants. Gen. xv. 1: John i. 1. See BREASTPLATE.

[URSULINES. An order of nuns founded by Angeli of Brescia, A. D. 1537, and dedicated to St. Ursula. They did not at first live in community, but at their own homes. They were employed in visiting the poor and sick, and in other acts of mercy. In 1554, Pope Paul III. confirmed their institution, and succeeding popes extended their privileges. In 1614 the Ursulines of Paris, by a bull of Paul V., adopted the regular life. Since then their principal vocation has been the training of young ladies.]

USURY, profit or gain from lending money or goods. Moses enacted a law to the effect that interest should not be taken from a poor person, neither for borrowed money, nor for articles of consumption, for instance, grain, which was borrowed with the expectation of being returned. Exod. xxii. 25: Lev. xxv. 35-37. A difficulty arose in determining who was to be considered a poor person in a case of this kind; and the law was accordingly altered in Deut. xxiii. 20, 21, and extended in its operation to all the Hebrews, whether they had more or less property; so that interest could be lawfully taken only of foreigners. As the system of the Jews went to secure every man's paternal inheritance to his own family, they could not exact it from their brethren, but only from strangers. As the law of nature does not forbid the receipt of moderate interest in the shape of rent, for the use of lands or houses, neither does it prohibit it for the loan of money or goods. When one man trades with the capital of another, and obtains a profit from it, he is bound in justice to return a part of it to his benefactor, who, in the hands of God, has been a second cause of "giving him power to get wealth." But should Divine Providence not favor the endeavors of some who have borrowed money, the duty of the lenders is to deal gently with them, and to be content with sharing in their losses, as they have been sharers in their gains. The Hebrews were therefore exhorted to lend money, etc., as a deed of mercy and brotherly kindness. Deut. xv. 7-11; xxiv. 13. And hence it happens that we find encomiums everywhere bestowed upon those who were willing to lend without insisting upon interest for the use of the thing lent. Ps. xv. 15; xxxvii. 21, 26; cxii. 5: Prov. xix. 17: Ezek. xviii. 8. This regulation in regard to taking interest was very well suited to the condition of a state that had been recently founded, and which had but very little mercantile dealings; and its principle, though not capable of being generally introduced into communities that are much engaged in commerce, may still be exercised toward those who stand toward us in the relation of brethren.

UZ, LAND OF, the country of Job. As there were three persons of this name, namely, the son of Aram, the son of Nahor, and the grandson of Seir the Horite, commentators are divided in their opinion as to the situation of the country meant by the land of Uz. Bochart, Spanheim, Calmet, Wells, and others, place it in Arabia Deserta. Michaelis places it in the valley of Damascus; which city was, in fact, built by Uz, the grandson of Shem. Archbishop Magee, Bishop Lowth, Dr. Hales, Dr. Good, and others, with more reason, fix the scene of the history of Job in Idumæa. This is also the opinion of Mr. Horne, who refers for a confirmation of it to Lam. iv. 21, where Uz is expressly said to be in Edom; and to Jer. xlix. 7, 8, 20: Ezek. xxv. 13: Amos i. 11, 12: Obad. 8, 9, where both Teman and Dedan are described as inhabitants of Edom. In effect, says Mr. Horne, nothing is clearer than that the history of an inhabitant of Idumæa is the subject of the poem which bears the name of Job, and that all the persons introduced into it were Idumæans, dwelling in Idumæa; in other words, Edomite Arabs.

[UZZAH. A Levite who was struck dead for an irreverent handling of the ark. 1 Sam

vi. 3-8 Compare Exod. xxv. 14: Numbers iv. 5, 6.]

[UZZIAH. See AZARIAH.]

VAIL. Women were wont to cover their faces with veils in token of modesty, of reverence, and subjection to their husbands. Gen. xxiv. 65: 1 Cor. xi. 3, etc. In modern times, the women of Syria never appear in the streets without their veils. These are of two kinds, the furragi and the common Aleppo veil; the former being worn by some of the Turkish women only; the latter indiscriminately by all. The first is in the form of a large cloak, with long straight sleeves, and a square hood hanging flat on the back; it is sometimes made of linen, sometimes of a shawl or cloth. This veil, reaching to the heels, conceals the whole of the dress, from the neck downward; while the head and face are covered by a large white handkerchief over the head-dress and forehead, and a smaller one tied transversely over the lower part of the face, hanging down on the neck. Many of the Turkish women, instead of the smaller handkerchief, use a long piece of black crape stiffened, which, sloping a little from the forehead, leaves room to breathe more freely. In this last way, the ladies are completely disguised; in the former, the eyes and nose remaining visible, they are easily known by their acquaintances. The radid is a species of veil, which Calmet supposes is worn by married women, as a token of their submission and dependence, and descends low down on the person. To lift up the veil of a virgin is reckoned a gross insult; but to take away the veil of a married woman is one of the greatest indignities that she can receive, because it deprives her of the badge which distinguishes and dignifies her in that character, and betokens her alliance to her husband, and her interest in his affections. This is the reason why the spouse so feelingly complains, "They took away my veil, רדדתי, from me." Cant. v. 7. When it is forcibly taken away by the husband, it is equivalent to divorce, and justly reckoned a most severe calamity; therefore, God threatened to take away the ornamental dresses of the daughters of Zion, including the radidim, the low descending veils: "In that day the Lord will take away the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils." Isaiah iii. 18, etc.

The ordinary Aleppo veil is a linen sheet, large enough to cover the whole habit from head to foot, and is brought over the face in a manner to conceal all but one eye. This is perhaps alluded to by the bridegroom in these words, "Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes." Cant. iv. 9. In Barbary, when the ladies appear in public, they always fold themselves up so closely in their hykes, that, even without their veils, one can discover very little of their faces. But in the summer months, when they retire to their country-seats, they walk abroad with less caution; though even then, on the approach of a stranger, they always drop their veil, as Rebekah did on the approach of Isaac. But although they are so closely wrapped up that those who look at them cannot see even their hands, still less their face, yet it is reckoned indecent in a man to fix his eyes upon them; he must let them pass without seeming at all to observe them. When a lady of distinction, says Hanway, travels on horseback, she is not only veiled, but has generally a servant, who runs or rides before her to clear the way; and on such occasions the men, even in the market-places, always turn their backs till the women are past, it being thought the highest ill-manners to look at them. A lady in the east considers herself degraded when she is exposed to the gaze of the other sex, which accounts for the conduct of Vashti in refusing to obey the command of the king. Their ideas of decency, on the other hand, forbid a virtuous woman to lay aside or even to lift up her veil in the presence of the other sex. She who ventures to disregard this prohibition inevitably ruins her character. From that moment she is noted as a woman of easy virtue, and her act is regarded as a signal for intrigue. Pitts informs us that in Barbary the courtesan appears in public without her veil; and, in Prov. vii. 13, 14, the harlot exposes herself in the same indecent manner: "So she caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face"—a face uncovered and shameless—"said unto him, I have peace-offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows." But it must nevertheless be remarked, that at different times, and in different parts of the east, the use or partial use of the veil has greatly varied.

[מסכתה, rendered veil in our version, περιβώλαια in the LXX., and pallium in the Vulgate, of Ruth iii. 15, appears to have been a kind of hyke or loose summer garment worn by women. In Isa. iii. 22, it is rendered "wimple," which is derived from the Dutch wimpelen, to veil or cover. Thus Spenser: "With a velle that wimpled everywhere, her head and face was hid." רדד is rendered θέριστρον in the LXX. of Cant. v. 7: Isa. iii. 23—pallium and theristrum, Vulgate. ציצית, rendered veil in Gen. xxiv. 65; xxxviii. 14, 19, seems to have been a thin mantle: θέριστρον, LXX.; pallium, Vulgate. מכסה, Exod. xxxiv. 33, 35, is rendered κάλυμμα, in the LXX., and also in 2 Cor. iii. 13-16, where it is made the symbol of the obscurity of the Mosaic dispensation and the blindness of Jewish prejudice. פרכת, Exod. xxxvi. 35: Lev. xvi. 2, 15; xxiv. 3, was a curtain separating the holy place from the holy of holies: it is rendered καταπέτασμα in the LXX., and in Matt. xxvii. 51: Mark xv. 38: Luke xxiii. 45: Heb. vi. 19; ix. 3: x. 20; in this last text it is made a type of Christ's body, which, by being sacrificed, gives us access to heaven.]

[VALENTINIANS. Followers of Valentinus, an Egyptian, who, disappointed of a bishopric, went to Rome, about A. D. 142, and inculcated a species of Gnosticism. He held that the pleroma of the Deity comprised thirty æons, half male, half female, who emanated from Buthos, the original of all things. From Sophia, the youngest of the æons, came Christ, the Holy Ghost, who compelled all of them to unite and form Jesus. These and other absurdities and blasphemies are set forth by Irenæus, who endeavored to expound his system, which was adopted with various modifications by Secundus,

Ptolemy, Marcus, Colobarsus, Heracleon, Theotimus, and Alexander. See Gnostics.]

[VANITY. רִבְבִּל seems to mean a vapor in Ps. lxi. 9, 10; (10, 11, Heb.;) cxliv. 4: Prov. xxi. 6: Isa. lvii. 13. Compare Job vii. 16: Ps. xxxix. 5; (6, Heb.;) James iv. 14: emptiness, folly, Ps. xciv. 11: Eccl. i. 2; iv. 7. So ματαιότης, Rom. viii. 20: Eph. iv. 17: 2 Pet. ii. 18; an idol, idolatry, Deut. xxxii. 21: 1 Kings xvi. 13, 26: 2 Kings xvii. 15: Ps. xxxi. 6: Jer. xvi. 19: Jonah ii. 8. Compare Acts xiv. 15: 1 Cor. viii. 4. שֵׁוּא, falsehood, or, adverbially, to no purpose, Exod. xx. 7; xxiii. 1: Ps. cxxvii. 1: Jer. ii. 30; iv. 30: Mal. iii. 14; an idol, idolatry, Jer. xviii. 15: Hos. xii. 11; (12, Heb.;) it is joined with רִבְבִּל in Ps. xxxi. 6; (7, Heb.;) Jonah ii. 8; (9, Heb.) רִיק, emptiness, worthlessness, Ps. iv. 3; so adjectively and adverbially, Lev. xxvi. 16, 20: Deut. xxxii. 47: Judg. ix. 4: 2 Sam. vi. 20: 2 Chron. xiii. 7: Ps. lxxiii. 13: Prov. xii. 11; xxviii. 9: Isa. xxx. 7; lxv. 23; hence the Syriac Raca, Matt. v. 22; without cause, Ps. vii. 5; xxv. 3.]

[VASHTI. The queen of Ahasuerus. Esth. i.]

[VAUDOIS. See WALDENSES.]

[VENGEANCE. נָקָם. ἐκδίκησις, avengement, vindictive punishment, Deut. xxxii. 35, 41: Ps. cxlix. 7: (compare Gen. iv. 15, 24:) Luke xviii. 7, 8; xxi. 22: Rom. xii. 19: 2 Cor. vii. 11: 2 Thess. i. 8: 1 Pet. ii. 14: (compare Rom. xiii. 4: 2 Cor. x. 6: Rev. vi. 10.) Δίκη, 2 Thess. i. 9: Jude 7. By this name the pagans of Melita designated the goddess of vindictive justice. Acts xxviii. 4.]

[VENIAL SIN. See MORTAL SIN.]

[VERGER. An officer in a cathedral, who takes care of the building, etc., and carries a rod before the bishop and chapter—hence his name.]

[VERMILION. שָׁרָב. מίλτος, LXX. Jer. xxii. 14: Ezek. xxiii. 14. Pliny says that millto was found in silver mines, in the form of reddish sand, was much used in his time by the Romans as a paint, and was formerly applied to sacred purposes. Bochart speaks of a lake in Africa, called by the Phœnicians sisara, on account of the vermilion, or red paint, which there abounded, and because of the neighboring river, Rubricatus, red-colored.]

[VERSCHORISTS. See HATTEMISTS.]

[VERSES. In 1551, Robert Stephens divided the New Testament into verses. In 1661, Athias, a Jew of Amsterdam, divided the Hebrew Bible into verses. Those in our English version correspond with the Hebrew division, except in a few cases. They are on the whole very convenient, but they frequently interrupt the sense. See CHAPTERS.]

[VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE. Eusebius says the Scriptures were translated into all languages of Greeks and Barbarians throughout the world, and studied by all nations as the oracles of God. Chrysostom says the Syrians, Egyptians, Indians, Persians, Ethiopians, and a multitude of other nations, translated them into their own tongues, whereby barbarians learned to be philosophers, and women and children, with the greatest ease, imbibed the doctrine of the gospel. Theodoret says every nation under heaven had the Scriptures in its own tongue: the Hebrew books were translated into Greek, Latin, Egyptian, Persian, Indian, Armenian, Scythian, Sauromatic—in a word, into all languages, in his time. Ulphilas is said to have translated the Bible into Gothic, and Jerome into Latin and Delmatic. The Bible now exists in more than one hundred and fifty languages and dialects. See Horne's "Introduction," Walton's "Prolegomena," "Bible in Many Tongues," and the articles SEPTUAGINT, SYRIAC VERSIONS, and VULGATE.]

[VIAL. Φιάλη. Rev. v. 8; xv. 7. A bowl, or censor.]

[VIATICUM. Ἐφόδιον. These terms mean preparation for a journey, and were applied to the sacraments, because they were considered as supports in the way to eternal life. And as death is a journey to the other world, the eucharist was administered to the dying as a provision for it. The Council of Nice ordained that no one "be deprived of his perfect and most necessary viaticum, when he departs out of this life." On this ground the Papists defend the administration of the wafer to the dying.]

[VICAR. The priest of a parish, the predial tithes of which belong to a chapter, or religious house, or to a layman, who receives them and only allows the vicar the smaller tithes, or a salary.—The pope claims to be vicar of Christ on earth. He has under him a grand vicar, a cardinal, whose jurisdiction extends over all priests.]

[VIGILS. Nocturnal assemblies for worship, preceding great festivals. According to Lactantius and Jerome, the Easter vigil was peculiarly solemn, as the second advent of Christ was expected on that night. Vigilantius inveighed against the vigils, on the ground of their being injurious to the morals of the young. They were defended by Jerome, but were at length abolished.]

VINE, נֵּזֶם, Gen. xl. 9; ἀμπέλως, Matt. xxvi. 29: Mark xiv. 25: Luke xxii. 18: John xv. 4, 5: James iii. 12: Rev. xiv. 19: a noble plant of the creeping kind, famous for its fruit, or grapes, and the liquor they afford. The vine is a common name or genus, including several species under it; and Moses, to distinguish the true vine, or that from which wine is made, from the rest, calls it the wine vine. Num. vi. 4. Some of the other sorts were of a poisonous quality, as appears from the story related among the miraculous acts of Elisha, 2 Kings iv. 39, 41. (See GRAPES.) The expression of "sitting every man under his own vine," probably alludes to the delightful eastern arbors, which were partly composed of vines. Capt. Norden, in like manner, speaks of vine arbors as common in the Egyptian gardens; and the Prænestine pavement in Dr. Shaw gives us the figure of an ancient one. Plantations of trees about houses are found very useful in hot countries, to give them an agreeable coolness. The ancient Israelites seem to have made use of the same means, and probably planted fruit trees, rather than other kinds, to produce that effect. "It is their manner in many places," says Sir Thomas Rowe's chaplain, speaking of the country of the Great Mogul, "to plant about and among their buildings trees which grow high and broad, the shadow whereof keeps their houses by far more cool: this I observed in a special manner, when we were ready to enter Amadavar; for it appeared to us as if we had been entering a wood rather than a city." "Immediately on entering," says Turner, "I was ushered into the court-yard of the aga, whom I found smoking under a vine, surrounded by horses, servants, and dogs, among which I distinguished an English pointer."

There were in Palestine many excellent vineyards. Scripture celebrates the vines of Sorek, of Sebamah, of Jazer, of Abel. Profane authors mention the excellent wines of Gaza, Sarepta, Libanus, Saron, Ascalon, and Tyre. Jacob, in the blessing which he gave Judah, "Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine, he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes," Genesis xlix. 11, showed the abundance of vines that should fall to his lot. "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches hang over the wall." Gen. xlix. 22. "To the northward and westward," says Morier, "are several villages, interspersed with extensive orchards and vineyards, the latter of which are generally enclosed by high walls. The Persian vine-dressers do all in their power to make the vine run up the wall, and curl over on the other side, which they do by tying stones to the extremity of the tendrils. The vine, particularly in Turkey and Greece, is frequently made to entwine on trellises around a well, where, in the heat of the day, whole families collect themselves, and sit under the shade."

Noah planted the vine after the deluge, and is supposed to have been the first who cultivated it. Gen. ix. 20. Many are of opinion that wine was not unknown before the deluge; and that this patriarch only continued to cultivate the vine after that event, as he had done before it; but the fathers think that he knew not the force of wine, having never used it before, nor having ever seen any one use it. He was the first that gathered the juice of the grape, and preserved it till by fermentation it became a potable liquor. Before him men only ate the grapes like other fruit. The law of Moses did not allow the planters of vineyards to eat the fruit before the fifth year. Lev. xix. 24, 25. The Israelites were also required to indulge the poor, the orphan, and the stranger, with the use of the grapes on the seventh year. A traveller was allowed to gather and eat the grapes in a vineyard as he passed along, but he was not permitted to carry any away. Deut. xxiii. 24. The scarcity of fuel, especially wood, in most parts of the east, is so great, that they supply it with every thing capable of burning; cow-dung dried, roots, parings of fruits, withered stalks of herbs and flowers. Matt. vi. 30. Vine twigs are particularly mentioned as used for fuel in dressing their food, by D'Arvieux, La Roque, and others: Ezekiel says, in his parable of the vine, used figuratively for the people of God, "Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work? Or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon? Behold, it is cast into the fire for fuel." Ezekiel xv. 3, 4. "If a man abide not in me," saith our Lord, "he is cast forth as a branch" of the vine, "and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." John xv. 6. [See SODOM, VINE OF, and WINE.]

VINEGAR, יֵצֶר, Num. vi. 3: Ruth ii. 14: Psalm lxi. 21: Prov. x. 26; xxv. 20: ὄξος, Matt. xxvii. 48: Mark xv. 36: John xix. 29, 30: an acid produced by a second fermentation of vinous liquors. The law of the Nazarite was that he should "separate himself from wine and strong drink, and should drink no vinegar of wine, nor vinegar of strong drink, nor any liquor of grapes." This is exactly the same prohibition that was given in the case of John the Baptist, Luke i. 15, οἶνον καὶ σικερα οὐ μὴ πίνῃ: wine and sikera he shall not drink. Any inebriating liquor, says Jerome, is called sicera, whether made of corn, apples, honey, dates, or other fruits. One of the four prohibited drinks among the Mohammedans in India is called sakar, which signifies inebriating drink in general, but especially date wine. From the original word, probably, we have our term cider, or sider, which, among us, exclusively means the fermented juice of apples. Vinegar was used by harvesters for their refreshment. Boaz told Ruth that she might come and dip her bread in vinegar with his people. Pliny says, "Aceto summa vis in refrigerando." [There is the greatest power in vinegar in cooling.] It made a very cooling beverage. It was generally diluted with water. When very strong, it affected the teeth disagreeably. Prov. x. 26. In Proverbs xxv. 20, the singing of songs to a heavy heart is finely compared to the contrariety or collocation between vinegar and nitre: untimely mirth to one in anxiety serves only to exasperate, and, as it were, put into a ferment by the intrusion.

The Emperor Pescennius Niger gave orders that his soldiers should drink nothing but vinegar on their marches. That which the Roman soldiers offered to our Saviour at his crucifixion was, probably, the vinegar they made use of for their own drinking. Constantine the Great allowed them wine and vinegar alternately, every day. This vinegar was not of that sort which we use for salads and sauces, but it was a tart wine called pesca, or sera. They make great use of it in Spain and Italy in harvest time. They use it also in Holland and on shipboard, to correct the ill taste of the water.

[VIOL. Isa. v. 12. The Psalter. See Music.]

VIPER, אֶרֶב, Job xx. 16: Isaiah xxx. 6; lix. 5; ἐχίνα, Matt. iii. 7; xii. 34; xxiii. 33: Luke iii. 7: Acts xxviii. 3: a serpent famed for the venomousness of its bite, which is one of the most dangerous poisons in the animal kingdom. So remarkable, says, Dr. Mead, has the viper been for its venom, that the remotest antiquity made it an emblem of what is hurtful and destructive. Nay, so terrible was the nature of these creatures, that they were very commonly thought to be sent as executioners of Divine vengeance upon mankind, for enormous crimes which had escaped the course of justice. An instance of such an opinion as this we have in the history of St. Paul, Acts xxviii., whom the people of Melita, when they saw the viper leap upon his hand, presently concluded to be a murderer; and as readily made a god of him when, instead of having his hand inflamed, or falling down dead—one or other of which is usually the effect of these bites—he without any harm shook the reptile into the fire: it being obvious enough to imagine that he must stand in a near relation at least to the gods themselves, who could thus command the messengers of their vengeance, and counterwork the effects of such powerful agents.

[VIRGINITY, PERPETUAL. The Latin and Greek Churches, and some Protestant divines, maintain the perpetual virginity of Mary. Augustin, in his treatise, De Sanctâ Virginitate, says that before the Annunciation Mary had taken the vow of chastity, and espoused Joseph with the understanding that he should be the guardian of her virginity. The dogma has no support from reason or Scripture; yet Ezek. xlv. 2 is adduced in its support. See Buckley's "Catechism of the Council of Trent," p. 45, and Pearson on the Creed, Art. III.]

[VIRGIN MARY, FEASTS OF THE. 1. Purification, or Candlemas, February 21, instituted in the sixth century. 2. Annunciation, or Lady-day, March 25. These two feasts are kept by the Anglican, as well as by the Latin and Oriental Churches. 3. Visitation of Mary to Elizabeth, July 2, instituted in 1889. 4. Assumption of the Virgin into heaven, or Dormitio Deiparæ, August 15. 5. Nativity of Mary, September 8, instituted in the east in the seventh century, in the west in the eleventh. 6. Naming of Mary, instituted in 1513. 7. Immaculate Conception of Mary, December 8, instituted 1708: the dogma was declared an article of faith by Pope Pius IX., December 8, 1854. See CONCEPTION, IMMACULATE, and MARIOLATRY.]

[VIRTUE. Ἀρετή, from Ἄρης, the god of war, among the Greeks denotes military virtue, strength, bravery, courage, fortitude, virtus, manliness; which seems to be its meaning, in a spiritual sense, in 2 Pet. i. 6, though Warburton, Bloomfield, and others, maintain that it never has that meaning in the New Testament, but that it always denotes moral excellence in general, whether of God, 1 Pet. ii. 9: 2 Pet. i. 3, or of man, Phil. iv. 8. It corresponds with דָּוָל, rendered "able," Exod. xviii. 21, 25; "strength," 2 Sam. xxii. 40; "virtuous," δυνάμεως, LXX., Ruth iii. 11: ἀνδρεία, LXX., Prov. xii. 4; xxxi. 10, 29. The word is δύναμις, miraculous power, in Mark v. 30: Luke vi. 19; viii. 46. Compare Mark vi. 14: Heb. ii. 4, Gr.]

VISION, the act of seeing; but, in Scripture, it generally signifies a supernatural appearance, either by dream or in reality, by which God made known his will and pleasure to those to whom it was vouchsafed. Acts ix. 10, 12; xvi. 9; xxvi. 13: 2 Cor. xii. 1. Thus, in the earliest times, to patriarchs, prophets, and holy men God sent angels, he appeared to them himself by night in dreams, he illuminated their minds, he made his voice to be heard by them, he sent them ecstasies, and transported them beyond themselves, and made them hear things that eye had not seen, ear had not heard, and which had not entered into the heart of man. The Lord showed himself to Moses, and spoke to him when he was at the mouth of the cave. Jesus Christ manifested himself to his apostles, in his transfiguration upon the mount, and on several other occasions after his resurrection. God appeared to Abraham under the form of three travellers; he showed himself to Isaiah and Ezekiel, in the splendor of his glory. Vision is also used for the prophecies written by the prophets. The beatific vision denotes the act of angels and glorified spirits beholding in heaven the unveiled splendors of the Lord Jehovah, and privileged to contemplate his perfections and plans in and by himself.

VOCATION, or CALLING, is a gracious act of God in Christ, by which, through his word and Spirit, he calls forth sinful men, who are liable to condemnation and placed under the dominion of sin, from the condition of the animal life, and from the pollutions and corruptions of this world, (2 Tim. i. 9: Matt. xi. 28: 1 Peter ii. 9, 10: Gal. i. 4: 2 Peter. ii. 20: Rom. x. 13-15: 1 Peter iii. 19: Gen. vi. 3,) unto "the fellowship of Jesus Christ," and of his kingdom and its benefits; that, being united unto him as their head, they may derive from him life, sensation, motion, and a plenitude of every spiritual blessing, to the glory of God and their own salvation. 1 Cor. i. 9: Gal. ii. 20: Eph. i. 3, 6: 2 Thess. ii. 13, 14. The end intended is, that they who have been called, answer by faith to God and to Christ who give the call, and that they thus become the covenanted people of God through Christ the mediator of the new covenant; and, after having become believers and parties to the covenant, that they love, fear, honor, and worship God and Christ, render in all things obedience to the Divine precepts "in righteousness and true holiness," and that by this means they "make their calling and election sure." Prov. i. 24: Heb. iii. 7: Rev. iii. 20: Eph. ii. 11-16: Titus iii. 8: Deut. vi. 4, 5: Jer. xxxii. 38, 39: Luke i. 74, 75: 2 Pet. i. 1, 10. The glory of God, who is supremely wise, good, merciful, just, and powerful, is so luminously displayed in this communication both of his grace and glory, as deservedly to raise into rapturous admiration the minds of angels and of men, and to employ their loosened tongues in celebrating the praises of Jehovah. Rev. iv. 8-11; v. 8-10. See CALLING.

VOW, a promise made to God, of doing some good thing hereafter. The use of vows is observable throughout Scripture. When Jacob went into Mesopotamia, he vowed to God the tenth of his estate, and promised to offer it at Bethel, to the honor of God. Gen. xxviii. 22. Moses enacts several laws for the regulation and execution of vows. A man might devote himself, or his children, to the Lord. Jephthah devoted his daughter. Judges xi. 30, 31. Samuel was vowed or consecrated to the service of the Lord before his birth, by his pious mother, Hannah; and was really offered to him, to serve in the tabernacle. 1 Sam. i. 21, etc. If a man and woman vowed themselves to the Lord, they were obliged to adhere strictly to his service, according to the conditions of the vow; but in some cases they might be redeemed. A man from twenty years of age till sixty, gave fifty shekels of silver; and a woman thirty. Lev. xxvii. 3. From the age of five years to twenty a man gave twenty shekels, and a woman ten; from a month old to five years, they gave for a boy five shekels, and for a girl three. A man of sixty years old, or upward, gave fifteen shekels, and a woman of the same age gave ten. If the person was poor, and could not procure this sum, the priest imposed a ransom upon him, according to his abilities. If any one had vowed an animal that was clean, he had not the liberty of redeeming it, or of exchanging it, but was obliged to sacrifice it to the Lord. If it was an unclean animal, and such as was not allowed to be sacrificed, the priest made a valuation of it; and if the proprietor would redeem it, he added a fifth part to the value, by way of forfeit. They did the same in proportion, when the thing vowed was a house or a field. They could not devote the first-born, because in any nature they belonged to the Lord. Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. Whatever was devoted by way of anathema, could not be redeemed, of whatever nature or quality it was. An animal was put to death, and other things were devoted for ever to the Lord. The consecration of Nazarites was a particular kind of vow. The vows and promises of children were void, of course, except they were ratified either by the express or tacit consent of their parents. It was the same with the vows of a married woman; they were of no validity, except confirmed by the express or tacit consent of her husband. Num. xxx. But widows, or liberated wives, were bound by their vows, whatever they were.

Whosoever invokes the awful name of God to witness any untruth, knowing it to be such, is guilty of taking it in vain. Our Lord did not mean to preclude solemn appeals to Heaven, whether oaths or vows, in courts of justice, or in important compacts. For an oath, or appeal to the greatest of all beings, as the Searcher of hearts, to witness a transaction, and to punish falsehood or perjury, is necessary, for putting an end to all strife or controversy among men, to promote confirmation or security of property. Heb. vi. 16. And it was sanctioned by the example of God, swearing by himself, Gen. xxii. 15: Heb. vi. 17, 18; and by the example of the patriarchs and saints of old: thus Abraham swore by the most high God, Creator of heaven and earth, Gen. xiv. 22; the transjordanite tribes, by the God of gods, the Lord. Joshua xxii. 22. And the law prescribed, "Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name." Deut. vi. 13. And afterward, "All Judah rejoiced at the oath, for they had sworn unto the Lord with a loud voice, with all their heart, and sought him with their whole desire; and he was found of them; and the Lord gave them rest round about." 2 Chron. xv. 14, 15. And a highly gifted apostle uses the following most solemn asseveration: "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not." 2 Cor. xi. 31. See the vows of the priests and Levites, to put away strange wives, Ezra x. 5; and to take no usury from their brethren. Neh. x. 29. St. Paul also vowed a vow, which he performed. Acts xviii. 18; xxi. 23. Our Lord, therefore, reëacted the law, while he guarded against the abuse of it, by prohibiting all oaths in common conversation, as a profanation either of God's name, where that was irreverently used, or where any of his works was substituted instead of the awful and terrible name of the Lord, which the Jews, through superstitious dread, at length ceased to use, from misinterpretation of Deut. xxviii. 58: "But I say unto you, Swear not at all," in common conversation, by any of your usual oaths, "neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; nor by the earth, for it is his footstool," etc. For, by the detestable casuistry of the scribes and Pharisees, some oaths were reckoned binding, others not, as we learn from the sequel: thus, to swear by the temple, the altar, heaven, etc., they considered as not binding; but to swear by the gold of the temple, by the gift on the altar, etc., they considered as binding; the absurdity and impiety of which practice is well exposed by our Lord in Matt. xxiii. 16-22.

VULGATE, a very ancient Latin translation of the Bible; and the only one the Church of Rome acknowledges to be authentic. The ancient Vulgate of the Old Testament was translated almost word for word from the Greek of the Septuagint. The author of the version is not known. It was a long time known by the name of the Italic, or old version, as being of very great antiquity in the Latin Church. It was the common, or vulgar version, before St. Jerome made a new one from the Hebrew original, with occasional references to the Septuagint; whence it has its name Vulgate. Nobilius, in 1558, and F. Morin, in 1628, gave new editions of it; pretending to have restored and re-collated it from the ancients who had cited it. It has since been retouched from the correction of St. Jerome; and it is this mixture of the ancient Italic version, and some corrections of St. Jerome, that is now called the Vulgate, and which the Council of Trent has declared to be authentic. It is this Vulgate alone that is used in the Romish Church, excepting some passages of the ancient Vulgate, which were left in the Missal and the Psalms, and which are still sung according to the old Italic version. St. Jerome declares that, in his revival of the Italic version, he used great care and circumspection, never varying from that version but when he thought it misrepresented the sense. But as the Greek copies to which he had access were not so ancient as those from which the Italic version had been made, some learned authors have been of opinion that it would have been much better if he had collected all the copies, and, by comparing them, have restored that translation to its original purity. It is plain that he never completed this work, and that he even left some faults in it, for fear of varying too much from the ancient version, since he renders in his commentaries some words otherwise than he has done in his translation. This version was not introduced into the Church but by degrees, for fear of offending weak persons. Rufinus, notwithstanding his enmity to St. Jerome, and his having exclaimed much against this performance, was one of the first to prefer it to the vulgar or Italian. This translation gained at last so great an authority by the approbation of Pope Gregory I., and his declared preference of it to every other, that it was subsequently brought into public use through all the western Churches. Although it was not regarded as authentic, except by the Council of Trent, it is certainly of some use, as serving to illustrate several passages both of the Old and New Testaments.

The two principal popish editions of the Vulgate are those of Pope Sixtus V. and Clement VIII.: the former was printed in 1590, after Pope Sixtus had collected the most ancient MSS. and best printed copies, summoned the most learned men out of all the nations of the Christian world, assembled a congregation of cardinals for their assistance and counsel, and presided over the whole himself. This edition was declared to be corrected in the very best manner possible, and published with a tremendous excommunication against every person who should presume ever afterward to alter the least particle of the edition thus authentically promulgated by his holiness, sitting in that chair, in qua Petri vivit potestas, et excellit auctoritas, [in which the power of Peter lived, and his authority excelled.] The other edition was published in 1592, by Pope Clement VIII., which was so different from that of Sixtus, as to contain two thousand variations, some of whole verses, and many others clearly and designedly contradictory in sense; and yet this edition is also ex cathedra, [from the chair,] pronounced as the only authentic one, and enforced by the same sentence of excommunication with the former. Clement suppressed the edition of his predecessor, so that copies of the Sixtine Vulgate are now very scarce, and have long been reckoned among literary rarities. Our learned countryman, Dr. James, the celebrated correspondent and able coadjutor of Archbishop Usher, relates, with all the ardor of a hard student, the delight which he experienced on unexpectedly obtaining a Sixtine copy; and he used it to good and effective purpose in his very clever book, entitled, "Bellum Papale," in which he has pointed out numerous additions, omissions, contradictions, and glaring differences between the Sixtine and Clementine editions. All the popish champions are exceedingly shy about recognizing this irreconcilable conflict between the productions of two such infallible personages; and the boldest of them wish to represent it as a thing of naught. But it is no light matter thus to tamper with the word of God.

The Romanists generally hold the Vulgate of the New Testament preferable to the common Greek text; because it is this alone, and not the Greek text, that the Council of Trent has declared authentic; accordingly that Church has, as it were, adopted this edition, and the priests read no other at the altar, the preachers quote no other in the pulpit, nor the divines in the schools. Yet some of their best authors, E. Bouhours for instance, own, that among the differences that are found between the common Greek and Vulgate, there are some in which the Greek reading appears more clear and natural than that of the Latin; so that the second might be corrected from the first, if the holy see should think fit. But those differences, taken in general, only consist in a few syllables or words; they rarely concern the sense. Besides, in some of the most considerable, the Vulgate is authorized by several ancient manuscripts. Bouhours spent the last years of his life in giving a French translation of the New Testament according to the Vulgate. It is probable that at the time the ancient Italic or Vulgate version of the New Testament was made, and at the time it was afterward compared with the Greek manuscripts by St. Jerome, as they were then nearer the times of the apostles, they had more accurate Greek copies, and those better kept, than any of those used when printing was invented.

"Highly as the Latin Vulgate is extolled by the Church of Rome," says Michaelis, "it was depreciated beyond measure at the beginning of the sixteenth century by several learned Protestants, whose example has been followed by men of inferior abilities. At the restoration of learning, when the faculty of writing elegant Latin was the highest accomplishment of a scholar, the Vulgate was regarded with contempt, as not written with classical purity. But after the Greek manuscripts were discovered, their readings were preferred to those of the Latin, because the New Testament was written in Greek, and the Latin was only a version; but it was not considered that these Greek manuscripts were modern in comparison of those originals from which the Latin was taken; nor was it known at that time that the more ancient the Greek manuscripts and the other versions were, the closer was their agreement with the Vulgate. Our ablest writers, such as Mill and Bengel, have been induced by F. Simon's treatise to abandon the opinion of their predecessors, and have ascribed to the Latin Vulgate a value perhaps greater than it deserves."

VULTURE, נָמֵר, and נֶמֶר, Lev. 'xi. 14: Isa. xxxiv. 15: a large bird of prey, somewhat resembling the eagle. There are several birds of the vulturine kind, which, though they differ much in respect to color and dimensions, yet are all easily distinguished by their naked heads, and beaks partly straight and partly crooked. They are frequent in Arabia, Egypt, and many parts of Africa and Asia. They have a most indelicate voracity, preying more upon carrion than live animals. They were declared unclean in the Levitical constitution. [Some think the daah of Lev. xi. 14, written raah in six of Dr. Kennicott's MSS., is the falcon, hawk, or kite; and the ayyah, there rendered kite, is the vulture.] The passage in Deut. xiv. 13 is precisely parallel in the Samaritan: the variation in the Hebrew is attributed to errors in transcription. See Boothroyd in loc. The daiyah, rendered vulture in Deut. xiv. 13, occurs in the plural in Isa. xxxiv. 15, and is supposed to mean the black vulture.]

[WAFER. A thin cake made of fine flour, with pure oil, forming a part of certain offerings Exod. xxix. 2, 23: Lev. ii. 4; vii. 12: Num. vi. 19.—Among the Papists, a small, thin portion of unleavened bread, bearing the figure of Christ, or the initials I. H. S., used in the eucharist.]

[WAGON. עֲגָלָה means a vehicle which is rolled forward on wheels. Gen. xlv. 19. It is rendered cart, 1 Sam. vi. 7 : Isa. xxviii. 27, 28 : Amos ii. 13. It is generally represented with two wheels on the Egyptian monuments.]

WALDENSES, WALLENCES, or ALBIGENSES, the Vaudois, or inhabitants of the beautiful valleys of the Alps between Italy and Provence. Many have supposed that they derived their name from Peter Waldo, or Valdo, a merchant of Lyons, in the twelfth century, and one of their leaders and patrons; but their history has been traced considerably farther back, which has led others to suppose that, on the contrary, he derived his name from them, as Peter the Waldensian, or Peter of the Valleys. The learned Dr. Allix, in his "History of the Churches of Piedmont," gives this account: For three hundred years or more, the Bishop of Rome attempted to subjugate the Church of Milan under his jurisdiction, and at last the interest of Rome grew too potent for the Church of Milan, planted by one of the disciples; insomuch that the bishop and the people, rather than own their jurisdiction, retired to the valleys of Lucerne and Angrogne, and thence were called Vallenses, Wallenses, or, The People in the Valleys. From a confession of their faith, of the early date, A. D. 1120, we extract the following particulars: 1. That the Scriptures teach that there is one God, almighty, all-wise, and all-good, who made all things by his goodness; for he formed Adam in his own image and likeness; but that by the envy of the devil sin entered into the world, and that we are sinners in and by Adam. 2. That Christ was promised to our fathers, who received the law; that so knowing by the law their unrighteousness and insufficiency, they might desire the coming of Christ to satisfy for their sins, and accomplish the law by himself. 3. That Christ was born in the time appointed by God the Father; that is to say, in the time when all iniquity abounded, that he might show us grace and mercy, as being faithful. 4. That Christ is our life, truth, peace, and righteousness; as also our pastor, advocate, and priest, who died for the salvation of all who believe, and is risen for our justification. 5. That there is no mediator and advocate with God the Father, save Jesus Christ. 6. That after this life there are only two places, the one for the saved, and the other for the damned. 7. That the feasts, the vigils of saints, the water which they call holy, as also to abstain from flesh on certain days, and the like, but especially the masses, are the inventions of men, and ought to be rejected. 8. That the sacraments are signs of the holy thing, visible forms of the invisible grace; and that it is good for the faithful to use those signs or visible forms; but that they are not essential to salvation. 9. That there are no other sacraments but baptism and the Lord's Supper. 10. That we ought to honor the secular powers by subjection, ready obedience, and paying of tribute. On the subject of infant baptism, they held different opinions, as Christians do in the present day.

For bearing this noble testimony against the Church of Rome, these pious people were for many centuries the subjects of a most cruel persecution, and in the thirteenth century the pope instituted a crusade against them, and they were pursued with a fury perfectly diabolical. Their principles, however, continued unsubdued, and at the Reformation their descendants were reckoned among the Protestants, with whom they were in doctrine so congenial; but in the seventeenth century the flames of persecution were again rekindled against them by the cruelty of Louis XIV. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, about fifteen thousand perished in the prisons of Pignerol, besides great numbers who perished among the mountains. They received, however, the powerful protection and support of England under William III. But still the house of Saxony continued to treat them as heretics, and they were oppressed by a variety of cruel edicts.

When Piedmont was subjected to France in 1800, the French government, Bonaparte being first consul, placed them on the same plan of toleration with the rest of France; but on the return of the King of Sardinia to Genoa, notwithstanding the intercession of Lord William Bentinck, the old persecuting edicts were revived in the end of 1814; and though they have not been subjected to fire and fagot as aforetime, their worship has been restrained, and they were not only stripped of all employments, but only by a most providential circumstance saved from a general massacre. Since then they have been visited by some pious and benevolent Englishmen; and the number of Waldenses, or Vaudois, has been taken at nineteen thousand seven hundred and ten, besides about fifty families residing at Turin.

Mr. Milner very properly connects this people with the Cathari, or Paulicians, of the seventh century, who resided chiefly in the valleys of Piedmont, and who, in the twelfth century, according to this valuable historian, received a great accession of members from the learned labors and godly zeal of Peter Waldo, a pious man of unusual learning for a layman at that period. His thoughts being turned to Divine things by the sudden death of a friend, he applied himself to the study of the Scriptures, and was, according to Mr. Milner, the first who, in the west of Europe, translated the Bible into a modern language. Waldo was rich, and distributed his wealth among the poor, and with it the bread of life, which endeared him to the lower classes; and it was probably the great increase of these pious people, in consequence of his exertions, which brought upon them the horrible crusade in the next century. This was, however, wholly on account of their pretended heresies, their bitterest enemies bearing testimony to the purity of their life and manners. Thus a pontifical inquisitor, quoted by Usher, says, "These heretics are known by their manners and conversation; for they are orderly and modest in their behavior and deportment; they avoid all appearance of pride in their dress; they are chaste, temperate, and sober; they seek not to amass riches; they abstain from anger; and, even while at work, are either learning or teaching." Scysselius, another popish writer, says of them, "Their heresy excepted, they generally live a purer life than other Christians." Liclenstenius, 1051 a Dominican, says, "In morals and life they are good; true in words; unanimous in brotherly love; but their faith is incorrigible and vile, as I have shown you in my treatise." But most remarkable is the testimony of Reinerius, an inquisitor of the thirteenth century: "Of all the sects which have been, or now exist, none is more injurious to the Church, (that is, of Rome,) for three reasons: 1. Because it is more ancient. Some say it has continued from the time of Silvester; others, from the time of the apostles. 2. Because it is more general. There is scarcely any country into which this sect has not crept. 3. Because all other heretics excite horror by the greatness of their blasphemies against God; but these have a great appearance of piety, as they live justly before men, and believe rightly all things concerning God, and all the articles which are contained in the creed."

[The Albigenses appear to have been the ecclesiastical descendants of the ancient Paulicians. Having been driven by persecution from Armenia, in the seventh and eighth centuries, they went into Thrace, thence to Bulgaria, thence to Germany, Italy, and France. They were known as Bulgarians, Runcarians, and Hungarians, probably from Hungary; Gazarins, from Gazarre, in Dalmatia; Patarins, as Moheim thinks from a place called Pataria, where they held their assemblies; Publicans, Tur-lupins, Cathari, or Puritans, and Albigenses, from Albi in France, where they most abounded. In Dauphiny, Provence, Languedoc, and Gascony, they were called Petrobrussians and Henricians, from Peter de Bruis and his successor Henry, who were leaders among them in the twelfth century. The Petrobrussians were charged with Manichæism, in repudiating the baptism of children, the Lord's Supper, and other catholic usages. But Mr. Faber says, "Judging from the language which they are reputed to have held, I am satisfied that they did nothing more than deny the spiritual grace of regeneration to follow, ex opere operato, the outward administration of the material sign in baptism, and that this was misconstrued into an assertion that infants ought not to be baptized. They rejected not the due administration of the eucharist, but its miserable perversion by the Church of Rome." And so of other points. In 1176, a council was held at Lombers, near Albi, for the examination of the Albigenses of Toulouse, called Good Men. According to Roger Hoveden, an historian of that age, they made before the council a profession of their faith, which is identical with the catholic doctrines of the gospel, specifically including the baptism of infants, the observance of the Lord's Supper, and marriage, thus repudiating the Manichæan errors imputed to them. After the popish crusades, by which, as Thuanus says, "they were slaughtered, routed, everywhere despoiled of their property and their dignities, and scattered in this direction and in that direction," some of them found a retreat in the Alpine valleys, where, in the fourteenth century, they were absorbed into the Church of the Waldenses. The name of Leonists given to the Waldenses, is derived by Mr. Faber, not from Lyons, on the Rhone, which gave name to the "Poor Men of Lyons," but from Lyons in Aquitaine, the Lugdunum Convenarum of the Pyrenees. Claude Scyssel, or Scysselius, Archbishop of Turin, in the fifteenth century, says, "The Valdenses of Piedmont derived themselves from a person named Leo, who in the time of the Emperor Constantine, execrating the avarice of Pope Sylvester and the immoderate endowment of the Roman Church, seceded from that communion, and drew after him all those who entertained right sentiments concerning the Christian religion." This Leo, Mr. Faber thinks, was Vigilantius, who, according to his enemy, Jerome, was born in Lyons, and may have been known as Vigilantius Leo, or the Leonist. All the Waldensian historians assert that their Church has existed in the valleys of Piedmont, uncorrupted by Popery, and of course unreformed, from the times of the apostles to the present day. From the tenor of their "Noble Lesson," which is referred to A. D. 1100, and a "Treatise on Antichrist," referred to A. D. 1160, it appears that they were very decided Protestants long before the Reformation. Their Confession of Faith, presented in 1542 to the King of France, is an orthodox and elaborate symbol, distinctly recognizing the doctrine of the sacraments as held by Protestants in general, and affirming that "Christ, having abolished circumcision, instituted baptism, and that they greatly err who deny baptism to the children of Christians." Dr. Baird, who has several times visited the valleys of Piedmont, and who is personally acquainted with most of their ministers, says that he was assured by them that it is their belief, founded on their histories and traditions, that they have ever, from the earliest times, baptized their children. "They stated to us, that if ever there was a time in which they did not baptize their children, it was in those ages of oppression when they were not permitted to do it themselves, and they would not suffer the Roman Catholic priests to administer that ordinance, inasmuch as they have added to it several superstitious practices, which they utterly reject." At the time of the Reformation in Switzerland and Germany, the Waldensians became acquainted with some of the Reformers, and at a synod at Angrogna, September, 1535, they adopted seventeen propositions, embracing those views on the Sabbath, marriage, sacraments, etc., which prevail among Protestants in general, though some of them are tinged with the peculiarities of Calvinism, which they learned from the Swiss divines. The same may be said of their present Confession, which consists of thirty-three articles, drawn up by Leger and others in 1655. It appears that the ecclesiastical polity of the ancient Paulicians and Albigenses was episcopal; and the Waldenses seem to have had bishops, or superintendents, who exercised the function of ordination, etc. The venerable Peyrani, when asked by Dr. Gilly, in 1823, whether they had not formerly bishops, said, "Yes, and I should now be styled bishop, for my office is virtually episcopal; but it would be absurd to retain the empty title, when we are too poor to support the dignity, and have little jurisdiction save that which is voluntarily submitted to among ourselves; the term moderator is, therefore, now in use among us, as being more consistent with our humiliation." "Of apostolical succession in the way of a regular sacerdotal line of descent," says Dr. Henderson, "they had no conception. They would have scouted the idea, as tending to reduce them to the yoke of bondage to human institutions. To apostolical succession they did, indeed, pretend; but it was a succession, not of men, but of doctrine. That the Vaudois ever had bishops, in the popish or prelatical acceptance of the term, does not appear. No trace of an episcopal hierarchy is to be found in any of their ancient documents." Faber says, "I readily confess that I am not able to demonstrate the circumstance of their possessing an apostolical succession, either as regularly transmitted by episcopal ordination, or as less regularly handed down by the simple imposition of the hands of the presbytery." Their present Church government conforms nearly to the Presbyterian model. They have a consistory in each church, consisting of the pastor, elders, one or more deacons, and a legal adviser. The next court is the Table, or Board, composed of three pastors and two laymen. This body represents the Synod in the intervals of its meetings. The Synod is the supreme court, embracing all the pastors and clerical professors in the college, the pastor-chaplain at Turin, and two elders from each parish. The moderator is president both of the Synod and the Table: he is elected for five years, and is eligible to reelection. The Waldenses use a liturgy, which was compiled from the liturgies of Geneva, Neuchâtel, and Lausanne, all of which were formerly in use among them. This was occasioned by their sending their candidates for the ministry to Swiss institutions, as they had none of their own. The territory of the Waldenses has been much reduced in size: its greatest length is now only twenty-two miles, greatest breadth sixteen—its area three hundred square miles—population twenty-two thousand Waldenses and four thousand Papists. They have about a score of ministers—one of whom has charge of a church lately erected in Turin, in which city, as well as in their secluded valleys, in spite of the opposition of the Papacy, they are allowed freedom of worship by the Sardinian government. The most extended reliable accounts of these interesting people, including details of the horrible persecutions which they have suffered from the "man of sin," are found in Faber's "Inquiry into the History and Theology of the Ancient Vallenses and Albigenses," Baird's "Protestantism in Italy," and the works cited by these authors.]

[WALLS. See CITIES and WAR.]

WAR, or WARFARE, the attempt to decide a contest or difference between princes, states, or large bodies of people, by resorting to extensive acts of violence, or, as the phrase is, by an appeal to arms. The Hebrews were formerly a very warlike nation. The books that inform us of their wars display neither ignorance nor flattery; but are writings inspired by the Spirit of truth and wisdom. Their warriors were none of those fabulous heroes or professed conquerors, whose business it was to ravage cities and provinces, and to reduce foreign nations under their dominion, merely for the sake of governing, or purchasing a name for themselves. They were commonly wise and valiant generals, raised up by God "to fight the battles of the Lord," and to exterminate his enemies. Such were Joshua, Caleb, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, David, Josiah, and the Maccabees, whose names alone are their own sufficient encomiums. Their wars were not undertaken upon slight occasions, or performed with a handful of people. Under Joshua the affair was of no less importance than to make himself master of a vast country which God had given up to him; and to root out several powerful nations that God had devoted to an anathema; and to vindicate an offended Deity, and human nature which had been debased by a wicked and corrupt people, who had filled up the measure of their iniquities. Under the Judges, the matter was to assert their liberty, by shaking off the yoke of powerful tyrants, who kept them in subjection. Under Saul and David the same motives prevailed to undertake war; and to these were added a further motive, of making a conquest of such provinces as God had promised to his people. Far was it from their intention merely to reduce the power of the Philistines, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Idumæans, the Arabians, the Syrians, and the several princes that were in possession of those countries. In the later times of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, we observe their kings bearing the shock of the greatest powers of Asia, of the kings of Assyria and Chaldea, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Nebuchadnezzar, who made the whole east tremble. Under the Maccabees a handful of men opposed the whole power of the kings of Syria, and against them maintained the religion of their fathers, and shook off the yoke of their oppressors, who had a design both against their religion and liberty. In still later times, with what courage, intrepidity, and constancy did they sustain the war against the Romans, who were then masters of the world!

We may distinguish two kinds of wars among the Hebrews: some were of obligation, as being expressly commanded by the Lord; but others were free and voluntary. The first were such as God appointed them to undertake: for example, against the Amalekites and the Canaanites, which were nations devoted to an anathema. The others were undertaken by the captains of the people, to revenge some injuries offered to the nation, to punish some insults or offences, or to defend their allies. Such was that which the Hebrews made against the city of Gibeah, and against the tribe of Benjamin, which would support them in their fault; that which David made against the Ammonites, whose king had affronted his ambassadors; and that of Joshua against the kings of the Canaanites, to protect the Gibeonites. Whatever reasons authorize a nation or a prince to make war against another, obtained, likewise, among the Hebrews; for all the laws of Moses suppose that the Israelites might make war, and might defend themselves, against their enemies. When a war was resolved upon, all the people that were capable of bearing arms were collected together, or only part of them, according as the exigence of the existing case and the necessity and importance of the enterprise required. For it does not appear that, before the reign of King David, there were any regular troops or magazines in Israel. A general rendezvous was appointed, a review was made of the people by tribes and by families, and then they marched against the enemy. When Saul, at the beginning of his reign, was informed of the cruel proposal that the Ammonites had made to the men of the city of Jabesh-gilead, he cut in pieces the oxen belonging to his plough, and sent them through the country, saying, "Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and Samuel, to the relief of Jabesh-gilead, so shall it be done unto his oxen." 1 Sam. xi. 7. In ancient times, those that went to war generally carried their own provisions along with them, or they took them from the enemy. Hence these wars were generally of short continuance; because it was hardly possible to subsist a large body of troops for a long time with such provisions as every one carried along with him. When David, Jesse's younger son, stayed behind to look after his father's flocks while his elder brothers went to the wars along with Saul, Jesse sent David to carry provisions to his brothers. 1 Sam. xvii. 13. We suppose that this way of making war prevailed also under Joshua, the Judges, Saul, David at the beginning of his reign, the kings of Judah and Israel who were successors to Rehoboam and Jeroboam, and under the Maccabees, till the time of Simon Maccabeus, prince and high-priest of the Jews, who had mercenary troops, that is, soldiers who received pay. 1 Macc. xiv. 32. Every one also provided his own arms for the war. The kings of the Hebrews went to the wars in person, and, in earlier times, fought on foot, as well as the meanest of their soldiers; no horses being used in the armies of Israel before David. The officers of war among the Hebrews were the general of the army, and the princes of the tribes or of the families of Israel, besides other princes or captains, some of a thousand, some of a hundred, some of fifty, and some of ten, men. They had also their scribes, who were a kind of commissioners that kept the muster-roll of the troops; and these had others under them who acted by their direction.

Military fortifications were at first nothing more than a trench or ditch, dug round a few cottages on a hill or mountain, together with the mound, which was formed by the sand dug out of it; except, perhaps, there might have sometimes been an elevated scaffolding for the purpose of throwing stones with the greater effect against the enemy. In the age of Moses and Joshua, the walls which surrounded cities were elevated to no inconsiderable height, and were furnished with towers. The art of fortification was encouraged and patronized by the Hebrew kings, and Jerusalem was always well defended, especially Mount Zion. In later times, the temple itself was used as a castle. The principal parts of a fortification were, 1. The wall, which, in some instances, was triple and double. 2 Chron. xxxii. 5. Walls were commonly made lofty and broad, so as to be neither readily passed over nor broken through. Jer. li. 58. The main wall terminated at the top in a parapet for the accommodation of the soldiers, which opened at intervals in a sort of embrasures, so as to give them an opportunity of fighting with missile weapons. 2. Towers, which were erected at certain distances from each other on the top of walls, and ascended to a great height, terminated at the top in a flat roof, and were surrounded with a parapet, which exhibited openings similar to those in the parapet of the walls. Towers of this kind were erected, likewise, over the gates of cities. In these towers guards were kept constantly stationed; at least, this was the case in the time of the kings. It was their business to make known any thing that they discovered at a distance; and whenever they noticed an irruption from an enemy, they blew the trumpet to arouse the citizens. 2 Sam. xiii. 34; xviii. 26, 27; 2 Kings ix. 17-19; Nahum ii. 1; 2 Chron. xvii. 2. Towers, likewise, which were somewhat larger in size, were erected in different parts of the country, particularly on places which were elevated; and these were guarded by a military force. Judges viii. 9, 17; ix. 46, 49, 51; Isa. xxi. 6; Hab. ii. 1; Hosea v. 8; Jer. xxxi. 6. We find, even to this day, that the circular edifices of this sort, which are still erected in the solitudes of Arabia Felix, bear their ancient name of castles or towers. 3. The walls were erected in such a way as to curve inward; the extremities of them, consequently, projected outward, and formed a kind of bastions. The object of forming the walls so as to present such projections, was to enable the inhabitants of the besieged city to attack the assailants in flank. We learn from the history of Tacitus, that the walls of Jerusalem, at the time of its being attacked by the Romans, were built in this manner. These projections were introduced by King Uzziah, B. C. 810, and are subsequently mentioned in Zeph. i. 16. 4. The digging of a fosse put it in the power of the inhabitants of a city to increase the elevation of the walls, and of itself threw a serious difficulty in the way of an enemy's approach. 2 Sam. xx. 15; Isa. xxvi. 1; Neh. iii. 8; Ps. xlviii. 13. The fosse, if the situation of the place admitted it, was filled with water. This was the case at Babylon. 5. The gates were at first made of wood, and were small in size. They were constructed in the manner of valve doors, and were secured by means of wooden bars. Subsequently, they were made larger and stronger; and, in order to prevent their being burned, were covered with plates of brass or iron. The bars were covered in the same manner, in order to prevent their being cut asunder; but it was sometimes the case that they were made wholly of iron. The bars were secured by a sort of lock. Ps. cvii. 16; Isa. xlv. 2.

Previously to commencing war, the heathen nations consulted oracles, soothsayers, necromancers, and also the lot, which was ascertained by shooting arrows of different colors. 1 Sam.

xxviii. 1-10: Isaiah xli. 21-24: Ezek. xxv. 11. The Hebrews, to whom things of this kind were interdicted, were in the habit, in the early part of their history, of inquiring of God by means of Urim and Thummim. Judges i. 1; xx. 27, 28: 1 Sam. xxiii. 2; xxviii. 6; xxx. 8. After the time of David, the kings who reigned in Palestine consulted, according to the different characters which they sustained, and the feelings which they exercised, sometimes true prophets, and sometimes false, in respect to the issue of war. 1 Kings xxii. 6-18: 2 Kings xix. 2, etc. Sacrifices were also offered, in reference to which the soldiers were said to consecrate themselves to the war. Isa. xlii. 3: Jer. vi. 4; li. 27: Joel iii. 9: Obad. 1. There are instances of formal declarations of war, and sometimes of previous negotiations, 2 Kings xiv. 8: 2 Chron. xxv. 27: Judges xi. 12-28; but ceremonies of this kind were not always observed. 2 Sam. x. 1-12. When the enemy made a sudden incursion, or when the war was unexpectedly commenced, the alarm was given to the people by messengers rapidly sent forth, by the sound of warlike trumpets, by standards floating on the loftiest places, by the clamor of many voices on the mountains, that echoed from summit to summit. Judges iii. 27; vi. 34; vii. 22; xix. 29, 30: 1 Sam. xi. 7, 8: Isaiah v. 26; xliii. 2; xviii. 3; xxx. 17; xlix. 2; lxii. 10. Military expeditions commonly commenced in the spring, 2 Sam. xi. 1, and were continued in the summer, but in the winter the soldiers went into quarters. The firm persuasion that God fights for the good against the wicked, discovers itself in the Old Testament, and accounts for the fact that, not only in the Hebrew, but also in the Arabic, Syriac, and Chaldaic languages, words which originally signify justice, innocence, or uprightness, signify likewise victory; and that words whose usual meaning is injustice or wickedness, also mean defeat or overthrow. The same may be said in respect to words which signify help or aid, inasmuch as the nation which conquered received aid from God, and God was its helper. Psalm vii. 9; ix. 9; xx. 6; xxvi. 1; xxxv. 24; xliii. 1; xlv. 5; lxxv. 3; lxxvi. 13; lxxviii. 9; lxxxii. 8: 1 Sam. xiv. 45: 2 Kings v. 1: Isa. lix. 17: Hab. iii. 8.

The attack of the orientals in battle has always been, and is to this day, characterized by vehemence and impetuosity. In case the enemy sustain an unaltered front, they retreat, but it is not long before they return again with renewed ardor. It was the practice of the Roman armies to stand still in the order of battle, and to receive the shock of their opposers. To this practice there are allusions in the following passages: 1 Cor. xvi. 13: Gal. v. 1: Eph. vi. 14: Phil. i. 27: 1 Thess. iii. 8: 2 Thess. ii. 15. The Greeks, while they were yet three or four furlongs distant from the enemy, commenced the song of war; something resembling which occurs in 2 Chron. xx. 21. They then raised a shout, which was also done among the Hebrews. 1 Sam. xvii. 52: Joshua vi. 6: Isa. v. 29, 30; xvii. 12: Jer. iv. 19; xxv. 30. The war shout in Judges vii. 20 was as follows: "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." In some instances it seems to have been a mere yell or inarticulate cry. The mere march of armies with their weapons, chariots, and trampling coursers, occasioned a great and confused noise, which is compared by the prophets to the roaring of the ocean, and the dashing of the mountain torrents. Isa. xvii. 12, 13; xxvii. 2. The descriptions of battles in the Bible are very brief; but although there is nothing especially said in respect to the order in which the battle commenced and was conducted, there is hardly a doubt that the light-armed troops, as was the case in other nations, were the first in the engagement. The main body followed them, and, with their spears extended, made a rapid and impetuous movement upon the enemy. Hence swiftness of foot in a soldier is mentioned as a ground of great commendation, not only in Homer, but in the Bible. 2 Sam. ii. 19-24: 1 Chron. xii. 8: Ps. xviii. 33. Those who obtained the victory were intoxicated with joy; the shout of triumph resounded from mountain to mountain. Isa. xlii. 11; lii. 7, 8: Jer. l. 2: Ezek. vii. 7: Nahum i. 15. The whole of the people, not excepting the women, went out to meet the returning conquerors with singing and with dancing. Judges xi. 34-37: 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7. Triumphal songs were uttered for the living, and elegies for the dead. 2 Sam. i. 17, 18: 2 Chron. xxxv. 25: Judges v. 1-31: Exod. xv. 1-21. Monuments in honor of the victory were erected, 2 Sam. viii. 13: Ps. lx.; and the arms of the enemy were hung up as trophies in the tabernacle. 1 Sam. xxxi. 10: 2 Kings xi. 10. The soldiers who conducted themselves meritoriously were honored with presents, and had the opportunity of entering into honorable matrimonial connections. Joshua xiv. 1 Sam. xvii. 25; xxviii. 17: 2 Sam. xviii. 11. See ARMIES, ARMS, [AND ENGINES OF WAR.]

[WASHING FEET. See PEDILAVIUM.]

[WATCHERS. The Ἀκουῖται were monks who arose at Constantinople in the fifth century, and were so called because they performed Divine worship without intermission, day and night. They were divided into three classes, one succeeding the other at an appointed hour.]

[WATCHMAN. One who guarded the tabernacle, the temple, the city, or the camp, particularly at night. Exod. xiv. 24: Judg. vii. 19: 1 Sam. xi. 11: 2 Sam. xviii. 24-27: Cant. iii. 3; v. 7: Isa. xxi. 6-12; lxii. 6. The title is suggestively given to a minister of religion. Isa. lii. 8; lvi. 10: Jer. vi. 17: Ezek. iii. 17; xxxiii. Mark xiii. 34-37: Heb. xiii. 17. See DAY.]

WATER. In the Sacred Scriptures, bread and water are commonly mentioned as the chief supports of human life; and to provide a sufficient quantity of water, to prepare it for use, and to deal it out to the thirsty, are among the principal cares of an oriental householder. The Moabites and Ammonites are reproached for not meeting the Israelites with bread and water; that is, with proper refreshments. Deut. xxxiii. 4. Nabal says in an insulting manner to David's messengers, "Shall I then take my bread and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and give it unto men whom I know not whence they be?" 1 Sam. xxv. 11. To furnish travellers with water is, even in present times, reckoned of so great importance, that many of the eastern philanthropists have been at considerable expense to procure them that enjoyment. The nature of the climate, and the general aspect of the oriental regions, require numerous fountains to excite and sustain the languid powers of vegetation; and the sun, burning with intense heat in a cloudless sky, demands for the fainting inhabitants the verdure, shade, and coolness which vegetation produces. Hence fountains of living water are met with in the towns and villages, in the fields and gardens, and by the sides of the roads and of the beaten tracks on the mountains; and a cup of cold water from these wells is no contemptible present. "Fatigued with heat and thirst," says Carne, "we came to a few cottages in a palm wood, and stopped to drink of a fountain of delicious water. In this northern climate no idea can be formed of the luxury of drinking in Egypt: little appetite for food is felt; but when, after crossing the burning sands, you reach the rich line of woods on the brink of the Nile, and pluck the fresh limes, and, mixing their juice with Egyptian sugar and the soft river water, drink repeated bowls of lemonade, you feel that every other pleasure of the senses must yield to this. One then perceives the beauty and force of those similes in Scripture, where the sweetest emotions of the heart are compared to the assuaging of thirst in a thirsty land." In Arabia, equal attention is paid, by the wealthy and benevolent, to the refreshment of the traveller. On one of the mountains of Arabia, Niebuhr found three little reservoirs, which are always kept full of fine water for the use of passengers. These reservoirs, which are about two feet and a half square, and from five to seven feet high, are round, or pointed at the top, of mason's work, having only a small opening in one of the sides, by which they pour water into them. Sometimes he found, near these places of Arab refreshment, a piece of a ground-shell, or a little scoop of wood, for lifting the water. The same attention to the comfort of travellers is manifested in Egypt, where public buildings are set apart in some of their cities, the business of whose inhabitants is to supply the passengers with water free of expense. Some of these houses make a very handsome appearance; and the persons appointed to wait on the passengers are required to have some vessels of copper, curiously tinned and filled with water, always ready on the window next the street. Some of the Mohammedan villages in Palestine, not far from Nazareth, brought Mr. Buckingham and his party bread and water, while on horseback, without even being solicited to do so; and when they halted to accept it, both compliments and blessings were mutually interchanged. "Here, as in every other part of Nubia," says Burckhardt, "the thirsty traveller finds, at short distances, water-jars placed by the road-side under a low roof. Every village pays a small monthly stipend to some person to fill these jars in the morning, and again toward evening. The same custom prevails in Upper Egypt, but on a larger scale; and there are caravanserais often found near the wells which supply travellers with water." In India the Hindoos go sometimes a great way to fetch water, and then boil it, that it may not be hurtful to travellers that are hot; and after this stand from morning till night in some great road, where there is neither pit nor rivulet, and offer it in honor of their gods, to be drunk by the passengers. This necessary work of charity in these hot countries seems to have been practiced among the more pious and humane Jews; and our Lord assures them that if they do this in his name, they shall not lose their reward. Hence a cup of water is a present in the east of great value, though there are some other refreshments of a superior quality. It is still the proper business of the females to supply the family with water. From this drudgery, however, the married women are exempted, unless when single women are wanting. The proper time for drawing water in those burning climates is in the morning, or when the sun is going down; then they go forth to perform that humble office adorned with their trinkets, some of which are often of great value. Agreeably to this custom, Rebekah went instead of her mother to fetch water from the well, and the servant of Abraham expected to meet an unmarried female there who might prove a suitable match for his master's son. In the East Indies, the women also draw water at the public wells, as Rebekah did, on that occasion, for travellers, their servants and their cattle; and women of no mean rank literally illustrate the conduct of an unfortunate princess in the Jewish history, by performing the services of a menial. 2 Sam. xiii. 8. The young women of Guzerat daily draw water from the wells, and carry the jars upon the head; but those of high rank carry them upon the shoulder. In the same way Rebekah carried her pitcher; and probably for the same reason, because she was the daughter of an eastern prince. Gen. xxiv. 45.

Water sometimes signifies the element of water, Gen. i. 10; and, metaphorically, trouble and afflictions. Ps. lxi. 1. In the language of the prophets, waters often denote a great multitude of people. Isa. viii. 7: Rev. xvii. 15. Water is put for children or posterity, Num. xxiv. 7: Isa. xlviii. 1; for the clouds, Ps. civ. 3. Waters sometimes stand for tears, Jer. ix. 1, 7; for the ordinances of the gospel, Isa. xii. 3; xxxv. 6, 7; lv. 1: John vii. 37, 38. "Stolen waters," denote unlawful pleasures with strange women. Prov. ix. 17. The Israelites are reproached with having forsaken the fountain of living water, to quench their thirst at broken cisterns; Jer. ii. 13; that is, with having quitted the worship of God for the worship of false and ridiculous deities. Waters of Meribah, or the waters of strife, were so called because of the quarrelling or contention and murmuring of the Israelites against Moses and against God. When they came to Kadesh, and there happened to be in want of water, they made a sedition against him and his brother Aaron. Numbers xx. 1, etc. Upon this occasion Moses committed that great sin with which God was so much displeased that he deprived him of the honor of introducing his people into the land of promise. [See POOL and WELLS.]

[WATERLANDIANS. A sect of Anabaptists that arose in Waterland, North Holland. They are less rigid than the Flandrians. They are also called Johannites, from John de Ries, who, assisted by Lubert Gerard, composed their Confession of Faith in 1580. One party of them is called Galenists, from Galen Abraham Haan, M. D., pastor of a Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam: they are latitudinarian in their views, and discard the title of Mennonites. Another party is called Apostoolians, from Samuel Apostool, also a Mennonite pastor at Amsterdam: they exclude all from their communion who do not subscribe the Mennonite Confession. See Mosheim's Eccl. Hist., Cent. xvi., xvii., and the article MENNONITES.]

WAX, וֶחֱזֵק, Psalm xxii. 14; lxviii. 2; xcvi. 5: Micah i. 4. Thus the LXX. throughout, κηρός, and Vulgate cera; so there is no room to doubt that this is the true meaning of the word; and the idea of the root appears to be soft, melting, yielding, or the like, which properties are not only well known to belong to wax, but are also intimated in all the passages of Scripture in which this word occurs.

WAYFARING MEN. In the primitive ages of the world there were no public inns or taverns. In those days the voluntary exhibition of hospitality to one who stood in need of it was highly honorable. The glory of an open-hearted and generous hospitality continued even after public inns or caravanserais were erected, and continues to this day in the east. Job xxii. 7; xxxi. 17: Gen. xviii. 3-9; xix. 2-10; Exod. ii. 20: Judg. xix. 2-10; Acts xvi. 15; xvii. 7; xxviii. 7: Matt. xxv. 35; Mark ix. 41: Rom. xii. 13: 1 Tim. iii. 2; v. 10: Heb. xiii. 2. Buckingham, in his "Travels among the Arab Tribes," says, "A foot-passenger could make his way at little or no expense, as travellers and wayfarers of every description halt at the sheikh's dwelling, where, whatever may be the rank or condition of the stranger, before any questions are asked him as to where he comes from, or whether he is going, coffee is served to him from a large pot always on the fire; and a meal of bread, milk, oil, honey, or butter, is set before him, for which no payment is ever demanded or even expected by the host, who, in this manner, feeds at least twenty persons on an average every day in the year from his own purse; at least, I could not learn that he was remunerated in any manner for this expenditure, though it is considered as a necessary consequence of his situation, as chief of the community, that he should maintain this ancient practice of hospitality to strangers. We had been directed to the house of Eesa, or Jesus. Our horses were taken into the courtyard of the house, and unburdened of their saddles, without a single question being asked on either side; and it was not until we had seated ourselves that our intention to remain here for the night was communicated to the master of the house; so much is it regarded a matter of course that those who have a house to shelter themselves in, and food to partake of, should share those comforts with wayfarers." The passage in Isa. xxxv. 8, "The wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein," receives elucidation from some of the accounts of modern travellers. Irwin, speaking of his passing through the deserts on the eastern side of the Nile, in his going from Upper Egypt to Cairo, tells us that after leaving a certain valley, which he mentions, their road lay over level ground. "As it would be next to an impossibility to find the way over these stony flats, where the heavy foot of a camel leaves no impression, the different bands of robbers"—wild Arabs, he means, who frequent that desert—"have heaped up stones at unequal distances for their direction through this desert. We have derived great assistance from the robbers in this respect, who are our guides when the marks either fail or are unintelligible to us." "It was on the 24th of March," says Hoste, "that I departed from Alexandria for Rosetta: it was a good day's journey thither, over a level country, but a perfect desert, so that the wind plays with the sand, and there is no trace of a road. We travel first six leagues along the sea-coast; but when we leave this, it is about six leagues more to Rosetta, and from thence to the town there are high stone or bark pillars, in a line, according to which travellers direct their journey."

WAYS, in Scripture, means conduct: for example: "Make your paths straight." The paths of the wicked are crooked. To forsake the ways of the Lord, is to forsake his laws. Ways also signifies custom, manners, and way of life: "All flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth." Gen. vi. 12; xix. 31: Jer. xxxii. 19. The way of the Lord expresses his conduct to us: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." Isa. lv. 8. We find through the whole of Scripture this kind of expressions: The way of peace, of justice, of iniquity, of truth, of darkness. To go the way of all the earth, Josh. xxiii. 14, signifies dying and the grave. A hard way represents the way of sinners, a way of impiety. Judg. ii. 19. Jesus Christ is called the Way, John xiv. 6, because it is by him alone that believers obtain eternal life and an entrance into heaven. The Psalmist says, "Thou wilt show me the path of life," Ps. xvi. 11: that is, Thou wilt raise my body from death to life, and conduct me to the place and state of everlasting happiness. When a great prince in the east sets out on a journey, it is usual to send a party of men before him, to clear the way. The state of those countries in every age, where roads are almost unknown, and, from the want of cultivation, in many parts overgrown with brambles, and other thorny plants, which renders travelling, especially with a large retinue, very inconvenient, requires this precaution. The Emperor of Hindostan, in his progress through his dominions, as described in the narrative of Sir Thomas Roe's embassy to the court of Delhi, was preceded by a very great company, sent before him to cut up the trees and bushes, to level and smooth the road, and prepare their place of encampment. Balin, who swayed the imperial sceptre of India, had five hundred chosen men, in rich livery, with their drawn sabres, who ran before him, proclaiming his approach, and clearing the way. Nor was this honor reserved exclusively for the reigning emperor: it was often shown to persons of royal birth. When an Indian princess made a visit to her father, the roads were directed to be repaired and made clear for her journey; fruit trees were planted, water-vessels placed in the road-side, and great illuminations prepared for the occasion. Mr. Bruce gives nearly the same account of a journey which the King of Abyssinia made through a part of his dominions. The chief magistrate of every district through which he had to pass was, by his office, obliged to have the roads cleared, levelled, and smoothed; and he mentions that a magistrate of one of the districts, having failed in this part of his duty, was, together with his son, immediately put to death on the spot, where a thorn happened to catch the garment, and interrupt for a moment the progress, of his majesty. This custom is easily recognized in that beautiful prediction: "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain; and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Isa. xl. 3-5. We shall be able, perhaps, to form a more clear and precise idea, from the account which Diodorus gives of the marches of Semiramis, the celebrated Queen of Babylon, into Media and Persia. In her march to Ecbatana, says the historian, she came to the Zarcean mountain, which, extending many furlongs, and being full of craggy precipices and deep hollows, could not be passed without taking a great compass. Being therefore desirous of leaving an everlasting memorial of herself, as well as of shortening the way, she ordered the precipices to be digged down, and the hollows to be filled up; and at great expense she made a shorter and more expeditious road; which to this day is called, from her, the road of Semiramis. Afterward she went into Persia, and all the other countries of Asia subject to her dominion; and wherever she went, she ordered the mountains and the precipices to be levelled, and raised causeways in the plain country, and at a great expense made the ways passable. Whatever may be in this story, the following statement is entitled to the fullest credit: "All eastern potentates have their precursors and a number of pioneers to clear the road, by removing obstacles, and filling up the ravines and the hollow ways in their route. In the days of Mogul splendor, the emperor caused the hills and mountains to be levelled, and the valleys to be filled up, for his convenience. This beautifully illustrates the figurative language in the approach of the Prince of Peace, when every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain."

WEAVING. The combined arts of spinning and weaving are among the first essentials of civilized society, and we find both to be of very ancient origin. The fabulous story of Penelope's web, and, still more, the frequent allusions to this art in the sacred writings, tend to show that the fabrication of cloth from threads, hair, etc., is a very ancient invention. It has, however, like other useful arts, undergone a vast succession of improvements, both as to the preparation of the materials of which cloth is made, and the apparatus necessary in its construction, as well as in the particular modes of operation by the artist. Weaving, when reduced to its original principle, is nothing more than the interlacing of the weft or cross threads into the parallel threads of the warp, so as to tie them together, and form a web or piece of cloth. This art is doubtless more ancient than that of spinning; and the first cloth was what we now call matting, that is, made by weaving together the shreds of the bark, or fibrous parts of plants, or the stalks, such as rushes and straws. This is still the substitute for cloth among most rude and savage nations. When they have advanced a step farther in civilization than the state of hunters, the skins of animals become scarce, and they require some more artificial substance for clothing, and which they can procure in greater quantities. When it was discovered that the delicate and short fibres which animals and vegetables afford could be so firmly united together by twisting, as to form threads of any required length and strength, the weaving art was placed on a very permanent foundation. By the process of spinning, which was very simple in the origin, the weaver is furnished with threads far superior to any natural vegetable fibres in lightness, strength, and flexibility; and he has only to combine them together in the most advantageous manner. In the beautiful description which is given in the last chapter of Solomon's Proverbs, of the domestic economy of the virtuous woman, it is said, "She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands: she layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff. She maketh herself coverings of tapestry," etc. Such is the occupation of females in the east in the present day. Not only do they employ themselves in working rich embroideries, but in making carpets filled with flowers and other pleasing figures. Dr. Shaw gives us an account of the last: "Carpets, which are much coarser than those from Turkey, are made here in great numbers, and of all sizes. But the chief branch of their manufactories is the making of hykes, or blankets, as we should call them. The women alone are employed in this work, (as Andromache and Penelope were of old,) who do not use the shuttle, but conduct every thread of the woof with their fingers." Hezekiah says, "I have cut off like a weaver my life." Isa. xxxviii. 12. Mr. Harmer suggests whether the simile here used may not refer to the weaving of a carpet filled with flowers and other ingenious devices; and that the meaning may be, that just as a weaver, after having wrought many decorations into a piece of carpeting, suddenly cuts it off, while the figures were rising into view fresh and beautiful, and the spectator expecting he would proceed in his work; so, after a variety of pleasing transactions in the course of life, it suddenly and unexpectedly comes to its end. [See SHUTTLE.]

[WEDDING. See MARRIAGE.]

[WEDNESDAY, ASH. The first day of Lent. Bellarmine says that the Council of Agde, in the fifth century, ordered that penitents should appear on this day in the congregation with ashes on their heads; but there is no trace of this in the acts of that council. A homily ascribed to Maximus Taurinensis, of the fifth century, is entitled, In diem cinerem; but if the homily be genuine, it is likely the title was added at a later period. It seems Gregory the Great originated this feast, and introduced the custom of consecrating the ashes; but it was not universally adopted till 1191, when it was established by Cœlestin III. Sackcloth and ashes were used by the Jews and the early Christians as badges of penitence, but they were not confined to any particular day. It is usual for the priest on Ash Wednesday to consecrate ashes and sprinkle them over the clergy and congregation, saying at the time, "Remember that dust (cinis) thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Hence the name, from cinis, ashes.]

WEEKS. A period of seven days, under the usual name of a week, שבועה, is mentioned as far back as the time of the deluge. Gen. vii. 4, 10; viii. 10, 12; xxix. 27, 28. It must, therefore, be considered a very ancient division of time, especially as the various nations among whom it has been noticed—for instance, the Nigri in Africa—appear to have received it from the sons of Noah. [See SABBATH.] The enumeration of the days of the week commenced at Sunday. Saturday was last or seventh, and was the Hebrew Sabbath, or day of rest. The Egyptians gave to the days of the week the same names that they assigned to the planets. From the circumstance that the Sabbath was the principal day of the week, the whole period of seven days was likewise called שבועה, in Syriac שבועה, in the New Testament αὐββατον and αὐββατα. The Jews, accordingly, in designating the successive days of the week, were accustomed to say, the first day of the Sabbath, that is, of the week; the second day of the Sabbath, that is, Sunday, Monday, etc. Mark xvi. 2, 9; Luke xxiv. 1; John xx. 1, 19. In addition to the week of days, the Jews had three other seasons, denominated weeks. Lev. xxv. 1–17; Deut. xvi. 9, 10; —1. The week of weeks. It was a period of seven weeks, or forty-nine days, which was succeeded on the fiftieth day by the feast of pentecost, πεντηκοστή, "fifty." Deut. xvi. 9, 10. 2. The week of years. This was a period of seven years, during the last of which the land remained untilled, and the people enjoyed a Sabbath or season of rest. 3. The week of seven sabbatical years. It was a period of forty-nine years, and was succeeded by the year of jubilee. Lev. xxv. 1–22; xxvi. 34. See YEAR.

WEIGHTS. See "Table of Weights and Measures," at the end of the volume.

WELLS. When the pool, the fountain, and the river fail, the oriental shepherd is reduced to the necessity of digging wells; and, in the patriarchal age, the discovery of water was reckoned of sufficient importance to be the subject of a formal report to the master of the flock, who commonly distinguished the spot by an appropriate name. A remarkable instance of this kind is recorded by Moses in these terms: "And Isaac departed thence, and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, and dwelt there. And Isaac digged again the wells of water which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham; and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them. And Isaac's servants digged in the valley, and found there a well of springing water. And the herdmen of Gerar did strive with Isaac's herdmen, saying, The water is ours; and he called the name of the well Esek, because they strove with him. And they digged another well; and they strove for that also, and he called the name of it Sitnah, (opposition;) and he removed from thence and digged another well; and for that they strove not; and he called the name of it Rehoboth, (room;) and he said, For now the Lord hath made room for us, and we shall be fruitful in the land." Gen. xxvi. 17, etc. "Strife," says Dr. Richardson, "between the different villagers and the different herdsmen here, exists still, as it did in the days of Abraham and Lot: the country has often changed masters; but the habits of the natives, both in this and other respects, have been nearly stationary." So important was the successful operation of sinking a well in Canaan, that the sacred historian remarks in another passage: "And it came to pass the same day, (that Isaac and Abimelech had concluded their treaty,) that Isaac's servants came and told him concerning the well which they had digged, and said unto him, We have found water; and he called it Shebah, (the oath;) therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba unto this day." Gen. xxvi. 33. To prevent the sand which is raised from the parched surface of the ground by the winds from filling up their wells, they were obliged to cover them with a stone. In this manner the well was covered from which the flocks of Laban were commonly watered; and the shepherds, careful not to leave them open at any time, patiently waited till all the flocks were gathered together before they removed the covering, and then, having drawn a sufficient quantity of water, they replaced the stone immediately. The extreme scarcity of water in these arid regions, entirely justifies such vigilant and parsimonious care in the management of this precious fluid, and accounts for the fierce contentions about the possession of a well, which so frequently happened between the shepherds of different masters. But after the question of right, or of possession, was decided, it would seem the shepherds were often detected in fraudulently watering their flocks and herds from their neighbor's well. To prevent this, they secured the cover with a lock, which continued in use so late as the days of Chardin, who frequently saw such precautions used in different parts of Asia, on account of the real scarcity of water there. According to that intelligent traveller, when the wells and cisterns were not locked up, some person was so far the proprietor that no one dared to open a well or cistern but in his presence. This was probably the reason that the shepherds of Padan-aram declined the invitation of Jacob to water the flocks before they were all assembled: either they had not the key of the lock which secured the stone, or, if they had, they durst not open it but in the presence of Rachel, to whose father the well belonged. It is ridiculous to suppose the stone was so heavy that the united strength of several Mesopotamian shepherds could not roll it from the mouth of the well, when Jacob had strength or address to remove it alone; or that, though a stranger, he ventured to break a standing rule for watering the flocks, which the natives did not dare to do, and that without opposition. The oriental shepherds were not on other occasions so passive, as the violent conduct of the men of Gerar sufficiently proves.

Twice in the day they led their flocks to the wells—at noon and when the sun was going down. To water the flocks was an operation of much labor, and occupied a considerable space of time. It was, therefore, an office of great kindness with which Jacob introduced himself to the notice of his relations, to roll back the stone which lay upon the mouth of the well, and draw water for the flocks which Rachel tended. Some of these wells are furnished with troughs and flights of steps down to the water, and other contrivances to facilitate the labor of watering the cattle. It is evident the well to which Rebekah went to draw water, near the city of Nahor, had some convenience of this kind; for it is written, "Rebekah hasted and emptied her pitcher into the trough, and ran again unto the well to draw water, and drew for all his camels." Gen. xxiv. 20. A trough was also placed by the well, from which the daughters of Jethro watered his flocks, Exod. ii. 16; and, if we may judge from circumstances, was a usual contrivance in every part of the east. In modern times Mr. Park found a trough near the well, from which the Moors watered their cattle in the sandy deserts of Zahara. Dr. Shaw, speaking of the occupation of the Moorish women in Barbary, says, "To finish the day, at the time of the evening, even at the time that the women go out to draw water, they are still to fit themselves with a pitcher or goat skin, and tying their sucking children behind them, trudge it in this manner two or three miles to fetch water." "The women in Persia," says Morier, "go in troops to draw water for the place. I have seen the elder ones sitting and chatting at the well, and spinning the coarse cotton of the country, while the young girls filled the skins which contain the water, and which they all carry on their backs into the town." "A public well," says Forbes, "without the Gate of Diamonds, in the city Dhuhoby, was a place of great resort: there most travellers halted for shade and refreshment: the women frequented the fountains and reservoirs morning and evening to draw water. Many of the Gwzerat wells have steps leading down to the surface of the water; others have not, nor do I recollect any furnished with buckets and ropes for the convenience of a stranger; most travellers are therefore provided with them, and halcarras and religious pilgrims frequently carry a small brass pot affixed to a long string for this purpose." [See JACOB'S WELL, SHEBA, and WATER.]

[WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY. A synod of one hundred and fifty divines, convened by parliament in the reign of Charles I., to settle the government, liturgy and doctrine of the Church of England. Their debates were restricted to such points as the parliament prescribed. Some counties sent one member, some two members, who were, for the most part, men of great ability. To appear impartial, many of the leading Episcopal divines were chosen, but few came, as the assembly was not a legal convocation, the king having declared against it. Six or seven Independents were also chosen. Many lords and commoners were added, to see that the divines did not go beyond their commission. They met first, in Henry the Seventh's chapel, July 1, 1643. They declared against the English Church and Liturgy, adopted a Confession of Faith, two Catechisms, and a Directory for worship and ordination, which may be found in Neal's "History of the Puritans." The Covenanters of Scotland adopted the Westminster Confession, and after the revolution of 1688 it was made, by act of parliament, the doctrinal standard of the Church of Scotland, and it now constitutes, together with the two catechisms, the creed of that communion and its various offshoots. An account of the debates of the Assembly may be found in the "Life," and in the "Remains," of Lightfoot.]

WHALE, וָהָיָה, Gen. i. 21: Job vii. 12: Ezek. xxxii. 2: κῆτος, Matt. xii. 40: the largest of all the inhabitants of the water. A late author, in a dissertation expressly for the purpose, has proved that the crocodile, and not the whale, is spoken of in Gen. i. 21. The word in Job vii. 12 must also be taken for the crocodile. It must mean some terrible animal, which, but for the watchful care of Divine Providence, would be very destructive. Our translators render it by dragon in Isaiah xxvii. 1, where the prophet gives this name to the King of Egypt: "He shall slay the dragon that is in the sea." The sea there is the river Nile, and the dragon the crocodile. Ezek. xxxii. 2. On this passage Bochart remarks, "The וָהָיָה is not a whale, as people imagine; for a whale has neither feet nor scales, neither is it to be found in the rivers of Egypt; neither does it ascend therefrom upon the land; neither is it taken in the meshes of a net; all of which properties are ascribed by Ezekiel to the וָהָיָה of Egypt. Whence it is plain that it is not a whale that is here spoken of, but the crocodile." Merrick supposes David, in Psalm lxxiv. 18, to speak of the tunnies, a kind of whale with which he was probably acquainted, and Bochart thinks it has its Greek name thunnos from the Hebrew thanot. The last-mentioned fish is undoubtedly that spoken of in Psalm civ. 26. We are told that, in order to preserve the prophet Jonah when he was thrown overboard by the mariners, "the Lord prepared a great fish to swallow him up." What kind of fish it was is not specified; but the Greek translators take the liberty to give us the word κῆτος, whale; and though St. Matthew, xii. 40, makes use of the same word, we may probably conclude that he did so in a general sense; and that we are not to understand it as an appropriated term to point out the particular species of fish. It is notorious that sharks are common in the Mediterranean.

WHEAT, חִטָּה, Gen. xxx. 14: Deut. viii. 8.

σλος, Matt. xiii. 25: Luke xvi. 7: 1 Cor. xv. 37: the principal and the most valuable kind of grain for the service of man. (See BARLEY, and FIRCHES.) In Lev. ii. directions are given for oblations, which in our translation are called meat-offerings; but as meat means flesh, and all kinds of offerings there specified were made of wheat, it had been better to render it "wheaten-offerings." Calmet has observed that there were five kinds of these—simple flour, oven cakes, cakes of the fire-plate, cakes of the frying-pan, and green ears of corn. The word כֶּמֶן, translated corn, Gen. xli. 35, and wheat in Jer. xlii. 28: Joel ii. 24: Amos v. 11, etc., is undoubtedly the barry, or wild corn of the Arabs, mentioned by Forskal. [The Egyptian wheat has several ears on one stalk. Gen. xli. 5.]

WHIRLWIND, a wind which rises suddenly from almost every point, is exceedingly impetuous and rapid, and imparts a whirling motion to dust, sand, water, and occasionally to bodies of great weight and bulk, carrying them either upward or downward, and scattering them about in different directions. Whirlwinds and waterspouts are supposed to proceed from the same cause; their only difference being, that the latter pass over the water, and the former over the land. Both of them have a progressive as well as a circular motion, generally rise after calms and great heats, and occur most frequently in warm latitudes. The wind blows in every direction from a large surrounding space, both toward the waterspout and the whirlwind; and a waterspout has been known to pass, in its progressive motion, from sea to land, and when it has reached the latter to produce all the phenomena and effects of a whirlwind. There is no doubt, therefore, of their arising from a similar cause, as they are both explicable on the same general principles. In the imagery employed by the sacred writers, these frightful hurricanes are introduced as the immediate instruments of the Divine indignation: "He shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living and in his wrath." Psalm lviii. 9. "God shall rebuke them, and they shall flee far off, and shall be chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, and like a rolling thing before the whirlwind." Isa. xvii. 13. "The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet." Nahum i. 3. All these are familiar images to the inhabitants of eastern countries, and receive some elucidation from the subjoined descriptions of English travellers. "On the 25th," says Bruce, "at four o'clock in the afternoon, we set out from the villages of the Nuba, intending to arrive at Basbock, where is the ferry over the Nile; but we had scarcely advanced two miles into the plain, when we were enclosed in a violent whirlwind, or what is called at sea the waterspout. The plain was red earth, which had been plentifully moistened by a shower in the night-time. The unfortunate camel that had been taken by Cohala seemed to be nearly in the centre of its vortex: it was lifted and thrown down at a considerable distance, and several of its ribs broken. Although, as far as I could guess, I was not near the centre, it whirled me off my feet, and threw me down upon my face, so as to make my nose gush out with blood: two of the servants, likewise, had the same fate. It plastered us all over with mud, almost as smoothly as could have been done with a trowel. It took away my sense and breathing for an instant, and my mouth and nose were full of mud when I recovered. I guess the sphere of its action to be about two hundred feet. It demolished one half of a small hut as if it had been cut through with a knife, and dispersed the materials all over the plain, leaving the other half standing." "When there was a perfect calm," observes Morier, "partial and strong currents of air would arise, and form whirlwinds, which produced high columns of sand all over the plain. Those that we saw at Shiraz were formed and dissipated in a few minutes; nor is it the nature of this phenomenon to travel far, it being a current of air that takes its way in a capricious and sudden manner, and is dissolved by the very nature of its formation. Whenever one of them took our tents, it generally disturbed them very materially, and frequently threw them down. Their appearance was that of waterspouts at sea, and perhaps they are produced in the same manner." And Burchell remarks: "The hottest days are often the most calm; and at such times the stillness of the atmosphere is sometimes suddenly disturbed in an extraordinary manner. Whirlwinds, raising up columns of dust to a great height in the air, and sweeping over the plains with momentary fury, were no unusual occurrence. As they were always harmless, it was an amusing sight to watch these tall pillars of dust as they rapidly passed by, carrying up every light substance to the height of from one to even three or four hundred feet. The rate at which they travelled varied from five to ten miles in the hour: their form was seldom straight, nor were they quite perpendicular, but uncertain and changing. Whenever they happened to pass over our fire, all the ashes were scattered in an instant, and nothing remained but the heavier sticks and logs. Sometimes they were observed to disappear, and in a minute or two afterward to make their reëappearance at a distance farther on. This occurred whenever they passed over rocky ground, or a surface on which there was no dust, nor other substances sufficiently light to be carried up in the vortex. Sometimes they changed their color, according to that of the soil or dust which lay in their march; and when they crossed a tract of country where the grass had lately been burned, they assumed a corresponding blackness. But to-day the calm and heat of the air was only the prelude to a violent wind, which commenced as soon as the sun had sunk, and continued during the greater part of the night. The great heat and long-protracted drought of the season had evaporated all moisture from the earth, and rendered the sandy soil excessively light and dusty. Astonishing quantities of the finer particles of this sand were carried up by the wind, and filled the whole atmosphere, where, at a great height, they were borne along by the tempest, and seemed to be real clouds, although of a reddish hue; while the heavier particles, descending again, presented, at a distance, the appearance of mist or driving rains."

[WHISPERERS. Secret slanderers: they are associated with backbiters, or open calumniators, Rom. i. 29, 30. Compare 2 Cor. xii. 20.]

WHITE, a favorite and emblematical color in Palestine. See HABITS.

[WHITSUNTIDE. Pentecost, so called because it was one of the stated times of solemn baptism, when the candidates appeared in white garments. Others say it comes from huit, eight, being the eighth Sunday after Easter; others, from the custom of giving to the poor on this day, milk, called white meat; others, from wite, a mulct, as persons were liable to be fined if they did not pay their tithe of young before that day. See PENTECOST.]

[WICKLIFFITES. Followers of John de Wickliff, an English divine and reformer of great learning and piety. He was born near Richmond, in Yorkshire, in 1324. He translated the Bible, and wrote many works, in which he attacked the Romish dogmas of the infallibility of the pope, transubstantiation, auricular confession, indulgences, the forced celibacy of the clergy, etc. He maintained that bishops and priests constitute but one order, and denounced the ecclesiastical corruptions of the age. He was much persecuted; nevertheless, he died in peace at Lutterworth, of which parish he was the rector, in 1384; but his bones were dug up in 1428, by order of the pope, burnt to ashes, and thrown into the Swift. See LOLLARDS.]

WIDOW. Among the Hebrews, even before the law, a widow who had no children by her husband was to marry the brother of her deceased spouse, in order to raise up children who might inherit his goods and perpetuate his name and family. We find the practice of this custom before the law in the person of Tamar, who married successively Er and Onan, the sons of Judah, and who was likewise to have married Shelah, the third son of this patriarch, after the two former were dead without issue. Gen. xxxviii. 6-11. The law that appoints these marriages is Deut. xxv. 5, etc. Two motives prevailed to the enacting of this law. The first was, the continuation of estates in the same family; and the other was to perpetuate a man's name in Israel. It was looked upon as a great misfortune for a man to die without an heir, or to see his inheritance pass into another family. This law was not confined to brothers-in-law only, but was extended to more distant relations of the same kind; as we see in the example of Ruth, who married Boaz after she had been refused by a nearer kinsman. See SANDALS.

[WIDOWS. The "widows indeed," spoken of 1 Tim. v., are supposed by some to have been deaconesses, who, being at least sixty years old, were placed on the superannuated list. By honoring them is meant supporting them. In the early Church deaconesses were generally chosen from among the widows of the Church. A deaconess, according to some ancient regulations, was to be a widow—one who had borne children—had been but once married—and was at least forty years old. See PRESBYTERÆ.]

[WILDERNESS. See DESERT.]

WILL. "In his primitive condition as he came out of the hands of his Creator, man was endowed with such a portion of knowledge, holiness, and power, as enabled him to understand, esteem, consider, will, and to perform the true good, according to the commandment delivered to him; yet none of these acts could he do, except through the assistance of Divine grace. But in his lapsed and sinful state, man is not capable, of and by himself, either to think, to will, or to do that which is really good; but it is necessary for him to be regenerated and renewed in his intellect, affections or will, and in all his powers, by God in Christ through the Holy Spirit, that he may be qualified rightly to understand, esteem, consider, will, and perform whatever is truly good. When he is made a partaker of this regeneration, or renovation, since he is delivered from sin, he is capable of thinking, willing, and doing that which is good, but yet not without the continued aids of Divine grace." Such were the sentiments of the often-misrepresented Arminius on this subject; to which is only to be added, to complete the scriptural view, that a degree of grace to consider his ways, and to return to God, is through the merit of Christ vouchsafed to every man. Every one must be conscious that he possesses free will, and that he is a free agent; that is, that he is capable of considering and reflecting upon the objects which are presented to his mind, and of acting, in such cases as are possible, according to the determination of his will. And, indeed, without this free agency, actions cannot be morally good or bad; nor can the agents be responsible for their conduct. But the corruption introduced into our nature by the fall of Adam has so weakened our mental powers, has given such force to our passions, and such perverseness to our wills, that a man "cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith and calling upon God." The most pious of those who lived under the Mosaic dispensation often acknowledged the necessity of extraordinary assistance from God: David prays to God to open his eyes, to guide and direct him; to create in him a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within him. Ps. li. 10; cxix. 18, 33, 35. Even we, whose minds are enlightened by the pure precepts of the gospel, and urged by the motives which it suggests, must still be convinced of our weakness and depravity, and confess, in the words of the tenth article, that "we have no power to do good works pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will." The necessity of Divine grace to strengthen and regulate our wills, and to coöperate with our endeavors after righteousness, is clearly asserted in the New Testament: "They that are in the flesh cannot please God." Rom. viii. 8. "Abide in me," says our Saviour, "and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine, and ye are the branches: he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing." John xv. 4, 5.

"No man can come to me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him." "It is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Phil. ii. 13. "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God." 2 Cor. iii. 5. "We know not what to pray for as we ought, but the Spirit helpeth our infirmities." Rom. viii. 26. We are said to be "led by the Spirit," and to "walk in the Spirit." Rom. viii. 14; Gal. v. 16, 25. These texts sufficiently prove that we stand in need both of a preventient and of a cooperating grace. This doctrine we find asserted in many of the ancient fathers, and particularly in Ambrose, who, in speaking of the effects of the fall, uses these words: "Thence was derived mortality, and no less a multitude of miseries than of crimes. Faith being lost, hope being abandoned, the understanding blinded, and the will made captive, no one found in himself the means of repairing these things. Without the worship of the true God, even that which seems to be virtue is sin; nor can any one please God without God. But whom does he please who does not please God, except himself and Satan? The nature, therefore, which was good is made bad by habit: man would not return unless God turned him." And Cyprian says, "We pray day and night that the sanctification and enlivening which springs from the grace of God may be preserved by his protection." Dr. Nicholls, after quoting many authorities to show that the doctrine of Divine grace always prevailed in the catholic Church, adds, "I have spent, perhaps, more time in, these testimonies than was absolutely necessary; but whatever I have done is to show that the doctrine of Divine grace is so essential a doctrine of Christianity, that not only the Holy Scriptures and the primitive fathers assert it, but likewise that the Christians could not in any age maintain their religion without it—it being necessary, not only for the discharge of Christian duties, but for the performance of our ordinary devotions." And this seems to have been the opinion of the compilers of our excellent liturgy, in many parts of which both a preventient and a cooperating grace is unequivocally acknowledged; particularly in the second collect for the evening service; in the fourth collect at the end of the communion service; in the collect for Easter day; in the collect for the fifth Sunday after Easter; in the collects for the third, ninth, seventeenth, nineteenth, and twenty-fifth Sundays after Trinity. This assistance of Divine grace is not inconsistent with the free agency of men: it does not place them under an irresistible restraint, or compel them to act contrary to their will. Our own exertions are necessary to enable us to work out our salvation; but our sufficiency for that purpose is from God. It is, however, impossible to ascertain the precise boundary between our natural efforts and the Divine assistance, whether that assistance be considered as a cooperating or a preventient grace. Without destroying our character as free and accountable beings, God may be mercifully pleased to counteract the depravity of our hearts by the suggestions of his Spirit; but still it remains with us to choose whether we will listen to those suggestions, or obey the lusts of the flesh. We may rest assured that he will, by the communication of his grace, varied often as to power and distinctness, help our infirmities, invigorate our resolutions, and supply our defects. The promises that if we draw nigh to God, God will draw nigh to us, and pour out his Spirit upon us, James iv. 8, Acts ii. 17, and that he will give his Holy Spirit to every one that asketh him, Luke xi. 13, imply that God is ever ready to work upon our hearts, and to aid our well-doing through the powerful though invisible operation of his Spirit: "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." John iii. 8. The joint agency of God and man in the work of human salvation is pointed out in the following passage: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure," Phil. ii. 12, 13; and therefore we may assure ourselves that free will and grace are not incompatible, though the mode and degree of their coöperation be utterly inexplicable, and though at different times one may appear for a season to overwhelm the other. This doctrine has, however, been the subject of much dispute among Christians: some sects contend for the irresistible impulses of grace, and others reject the idea of any influence of the Divine Spirit upon the human mind. The former opinion seems irreconcilable with the free agency of man, if held as the constant unvarying mode in which he carries on his work in the soul of man, and the latter contradicts the authority of Scripture; "and therefore," says Veneer, "let us neither ascribe nothing to free will, nor too much: let us not, with the defenders of irresistible grace, deny free will, or make it of no effect, not only before, but even under, grace; nor let us suffer the efficacy of saving grace, on the other hand, to be swallowed up in the strength and freedom of our wills; but, allowing the government or superiority to the grace of God, let the will of man be admitted to be its handmaid, but such a one as is free, and freely obeys; by which, when it is freely excited by the admonitions of preventient grace, when it is prepared as to its affections, strengthened and assisted as to its powers and faculties, a man freely and willingly coöperates with God, that the grace of God be not received in vain." "All men are also to be admonished," observes Cranmer, in his "Necessary Doctrine," "and chiefly preachers, that in this high matter they, looking on both sides, so temper and moderate themselves, that they neither so preach the grace of God that they take away thereby free will, nor, on the other side, so extol free will, that injury be done to the grace of God." And Jortin remarks: "Thus do the doctrine of Divine grace and the doctrine of free will or human liberty unite and conspire, in a friendly manner, to our everlasting good. The first is adapted to excite in us gratitude, faith, and humility; the second, to awaken our caution and quicken our diligence."

Many, indeed, relying on mere abstract arguments, deny free will, in the strict meaning of the term, altogether, and define the mental faculties of man according to their various fancies. But the existence and nature of our moral and rational powers are and ought to be, in true philosophy, the subject of mental observation, not the sport of hypothesis. Those who love metaphysical abstractions may people the worlds of their imagination with beings of whatsoever character they prefer; but the nature and capabilities of man, as he really is, must be determined not by speculation but by experience. It is true that this experience is the object of consciousness, not of the senses; and, accordingly, each man is, in some respect, the judge in his own case, and may, if he chooses, deny his own freedom and his power of self-control, or of using those means which God hath appointed to lead to this result. But this is seldom done in ordinary life, except by those abandoned individuals who seek, in such a statement, an excuse for capricious or unprincipled conduct—an excuse which is never admitted by the majority of reasoning persons, much less by the truly pious. The latter, indeed, will always be found attributing any thing good they achieve to the coöperating efficacy of superior assistance. But they will, with equal sincerity, blame themselves for what they have done amiss; or, in other words, acknowledge that they should and might have willed and acted otherwise; and this is exactly the practical question, the very turning-point, on which the whole controversy hinges. The only competent judges in such a question, says Dr. R. H. Graves, are those who have made it the subject of mental observation, exertion, and pursuit; or, in other words, those who have sought after righteousness, under whatever dispensation. Acts x. 35: Romans ii. 7, 10. And surely the confessions, the prayers, the repentance, and the sacrifices of the humble and pious of all ages show that they felt, not only that they were themselves to blame for their actions, and therefore that they might have done otherwise—that is, they had a free will—but that, to make this will operative in spiritual matters, they required an aid beyond the reach of mere human attainment. Some may fancy this statement inconsistent in itself; and I allow that it cannot satisfy the mere speculative supporters either of free will or its opponents. But to me it seems the testimony of conscience and experience, which, in natural religion, must, as I conceive, be preferred to abstract hypothesis. The inquiry is not how the mind may be, but how it is actually, constituted. This surely is a question of fact, not of conjecture, and must therefore be decided by an appeal to common sense and experience, not by random speculation. Again: even those who in theory contend for the doctrine of necessity, yet in all the affairs of life where their interests, comforts, or gratifications are concerned, both speak and act as if they disbelieved it, and as if they really imagined themselves capable of such self-determination and self-control, as to improve their talents, their opportunities, and their acquirements, and so to exercise a material influence on their worldly fortunes. But suppose the assertions of individuals, as to their consciousness in this particular, to disagree. It is then evident that, the question being as to the nature of man in general, it must be determined by the voice of preponderating testimony. But how, it may be asked, are the suffrages to be collected? Since the judgment of each individual must in this scheme be considered as a separate fact, how is a sufficiently extensive induction to be made? In answer, it may be asserted that in every civilized nation the induction has been already made, the suffrages have been taken, the case has been tried, and the decision is on record. And the verdict is the most impartial that can be looked for in such a case, because given without any reference to the controversy in dispute. All human laws forbidding, condemning, and punishing vicious actions, are grounded on the acknowledged supposition that man is possessed of a self-control, a self-determining power, by which he could, both in will and in deed, have avoided the very actions for which he is condemned, and in the very circumstances in which he has committed them. Nor would it be easy to find a case where the criminal has deceived himself, or hoped to deceive his judges, by pleading that he labored under a fatal necessity, which rendered his crimes unavoidable, and therefore excusable. The justice of all legislative enactments evidently and essentially depends on the principle that the things prohibited can be avoided, or, in other words, might have been done otherwise than they were done; and this is the very turning-point of the controversy. Accordingly, in whatever instances such freedom of will is not presupposed, (as in the cases of idiots and madmen,) the operation of such enactments is suspended. All nations, therefore, who consent to frame and abide by such laws, do thereby testify their deliberate and solemn assent to the truth of this principle, and, consequently, to the existence of free will in man; and do certify the sincerity of their conviction by staking upon it their properties, their liberties, and their lives. Numberless other instances might be adduced in which the practice of mankind implies their belief in this principle. And so conscious of this are the opponents of free will, that they generally deprecate appeals to common sense and experience, and resort to metaphysical arguments to examine what is in truth a matter of fact, not of conjecture; or, in other words, to determine not what man is, but what they imagine he must be. In their reasonings they differ, as might have been expected, as much from each other as they do from truth and reality. But the experience of common sense and conscience will always decide, that no man can conscientiously make this excuse for his crimes, that he could not have willed or acted otherwise than he did. The existence of the above faculties in the human mind once acknowledged, leads, by necessary inference, to the admission that there exists in the great First Cause a power to create them. Not, indeed, that these faculties themselves exist in him in the same manner as in us, but the power of originating and producing them in all possible variety. We can indeed conclude, that, having created all these in us, his nature must be so perfect that we cannot attribute to him any line of conduct inconsistent with whatever is excellent in the exercise of these faculties in ourselves. And therefore we cannot ascribe to him, as his special act, any thing we should perceive to be unworthy of any just or merciful, any wise or upright being. But this furnishes no clue whatever to a knowledge of the real constitution of his nature, or of the manner in which his Divine attributes exist together. In truth, we no more comprehend how he wills than how he acts, and therefore we have no better right to assert that he wills evil than that he does evil. Again: we as little understand how he knows as how he sees, and therefore might as well argue that all things exist in consequence of his beholding them, as that all events arise in consequence of his foreknowing them. In short, all that can be inferred by reason concerning the intrinsic nature of the invisible, unsearchable Deity, must be admitted by the candid inquirer to be no better than conjecture. And he who should hope from such doubtful support as his fancied insight into the unknown operations of the Divine mind to suspend a system of irrespective decrees, embracing the moral government of the world, would but too much resemble him who should imagine the material globe adequately sustained if upheld by a chain whose highest links were wrapped in clouds and darkness. Thus our affirmative knowledge of the Deity, as derived from this part of our inquiry, consists in the certainty (though his nature is unknown to us) that he is the creative source of all that is great, glorious, and good, in heaven or in earth; while we may negatively conclude that his moral government shall, on the whole, be conducted in a manner not inconsistent with whatever is excellent in the exercise of power and wisdom, justice and mercy, goodness and truth. Nor is it a little important, as connected with the present inquiry, to keep in mind this distinction between our affirmative and negative knowledge in this matter. For it shows us that as, on the one side, we cannot pretend to such an insight into the nature and character of the Divine knowledge as to deduce therefrom a system of eternal and irrespective decrees, so neither, on the other, can this system of moral government be ascribed to the Deity, because it would be manifestly unworthy, not merely of him who has created all moral excellence, but of any of those beings on whom he has conferred the most ordinary degrees of mercy and justice. The natural benefits or evils arising out of moral or immoral practices are, in fact, so many rewards or punishments, exhibiting the Being who has so constituted our nature as a moral governor. This part of his government may not be so clearly discernible in individual instances, because much of the happiness and unhappiness attending virtue and vice is mental and invisible. In the case of nations, however, considered merely as bodies politic, the internal sanction of an approving or reproaching conscience, of subdued or distracting passions, can have no existence; and therefore the external sanctions are more uniformly enforced. Hence, whoever carefully examines the dealings of Providence with the human race will admit that national prosperity has ever kept pace with national wisdom and integrity; whereas, the greatest empires, when once corrupted, have soon become the prey of internal strife or foreign domination. Again: man is made for society, and cannot exist without it: consequently, all the regulations which are really conducive to the maintenance of civil policy and social order must be regarded as evident consequences of our nature, when enlightened to the rational pursuit of its own advantage; and therefore should be considered as intimations of a moral government, carried on through their intervention. In addition to which, it ought to be observed, that these laws may be regarded in another point of view—as a most important class of moral phenomena; inasmuch as they virtually exhibit the most unexceptionable declarations of reason on this subject, because they are collected from the common consent of mankind, and therefore rendered, in a great measure, independent of the obliquities of individual intellect, the errors of private judgment, and the partial views of self-interest, prejudice, or passion. But all the laws of civilized nations, both in their enactment and administration, not only presuppose certain notions concerning the freedom and accountableness of man, the merit and demerit of human actions, and the inseparable connection of virtue and vice with rewards and punishments, but greatly contribute to fix and perpetuate these notions. It is therefore evidently the intention of that part of the moral government with which we are acquainted, to impress these principles deeply on the human mind, and to induce the human race to regulate their conduct accordingly. The laws, then, of this moral government under which we find ourselves placed, and from which we cannot escape, correspond with and corroborate the conclusions deduced from the observation of mental phenomena. And from both we conclude that similar principles of government will be adopted (so far, at least, as man is concerned) in other worlds and in future ages; only more developed, and therefore more evidently free from its present apparent imperfections. Upon this account we look, in another life, for some such general disclosure and consummation of the ways and wisdom of Providence as shall vindicate, even in the minor details, the grand principles upon which, generally speaking, the government of God is at present obviously conducted. How this may be done, with many questions connected therewith, reason without revelation could, as I conceive, do little more than form plausible conjectures; though now that it has pleased God in Christ to bring “life and immortality to light through the gospel,” it is possible for reason to estimate the beauty and the mercy and the wisdom of the dispensation by which it has been effected.

[WIMPLE. See VAIL.]

WIND. The Hebrews, like us, acknowledge four principal winds, Ezek. xlii. 16-18: the east wind, the north wind, the south wind, and the west wind, or that from the Mediterranean sea. See WHIRLWIND.

WINDOWS. The method of building both in Barbary and the Levant seems to have continued the same from the earliest ages. All the windows open into private courts, if we except sometimes a latticed window or balcony toward the street. It is only during the celebration of some zeenah, or public festival, that these houses and their latticed windows are left open; for this being a time of great liberty, revelling, and extravagance, each family is ambitious of adorning both the inside and outside of their houses with the richest part of their furniture; while crowds of both sexes, dressed out in their best apparel, and laying aside all ceremony and restraint, go in and out where they please. The account we have, 2 Kings ix. 30, of Jezebel's painting her face, tiring her head, and looking out at a window upon Jehu's public entry into Jezreel, gives us a lively idea of an eastern lady at one of those solemnities.

WINE, יין, Gen. xix. 32, olvoç, Matt. ix. 17, a liquor expressed from grapes. The art of refining wine upon the lees was known to the Jews. The particular process, as it is now practiced in the island of Cyprus, is described in Mariti's Travels. The wine is put immediately from the vat into large vases of potters'-ware, pointed at the bottom, till they are nearly full, when they are covered tight and buried. At the end of a year, what is designed for sale is drawn into wooden casks. The dregs in the vases are put into wooden casks destined to receive wine, with as much of the liquor as is necessary to prevent them from becoming dry before use. Casks thus prepared are very valuable. When the wine a year old is put in, the dregs rise, and make it appear muddy, but afterward they subside and carry down all the other feculences. The dregs are so much valued that they are not sold with the wine in the vase, unless particularly mentioned.

The "new wine," or "must," is mentioned, Isa. xlix. 26: Joel i. 5; iii. 18; and Amos ix. 13, under the name קציר. The "mixed wine," במזג, Prov. xxiii. 30, and in Isa. lxxv. 11 rendered "drink-offering," may mean wine made stronger and more inebriating by the addition of higher and more powerful ingredients, such as honey, spices, defrutum, or wine inspissated by boiling it down, myrrh, mandragora, and other strong drugs. Thus the drunkard is properly described as one that seeketh "mixed wine," Prov. xxiii. 30, and is mighty to "mingle strong drink." Isa. v. 22; and hence the Psalmist took that highly poetical and sublime image of the cup of God's wrath, called by Isaiah, li. 17, "the cup of trembling," containing, as St. John expresses it, Rev. xiv. 10, pure wine made yet stronger by a mixture of powerful ingredients: "In the hand of Jehovah is a cup, and the wine is turbid; it is full of a mixed liquor, and he poureth out of it," or, rather, "he poureth it out of one vessel into another," to mix it perfectly; "verily the dregs thereof," the thickest sediment of the strong ingredients mingled with it, "all the ungodly of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them." [Ps. lxxv. 8.] "Spiced wine," Cant. vii. 2, was wine rendered more palatable and fragrant with aromatics. This was considered as a great delicacy. Spiced wines were not peculiar to the Jews. Hafiz speaks of wines "richly bitter, richly sweet." The Romans lined their vessels, amphoræ, with odorous gums, to give the wine a warm bitter flavor; and the orientals now use the admixture of spices to give their wines a favorite relish. The "wine of Helbon," Ezek. xxvii. 18, was an excellent kind of wine, known to the ancients by the name of chalybonium vinum. It was made at Damascus. the Persians had planted vineyards there on purpose, says Posidosius, quoted by Athenæus. This author says that the kings of Persia used no other wine. Hosea, xiv. 7, mentions the wine of Lebanon. The wines from the vineyards on that mount are even to this day in repute; but some think that this may mean a sweet-scented wine, or wine flavored with fragrant gums.

[The wine used in the Lord's Supper was that in common use, made from "the fruit of the vine." The early Christians mixed water with it; sometimes the proportion of water was one-fourth—sometimes one-third. The Western Church uses cold water; the Greeks first put in cold and after the consecration add warm, thus designing to symbolize the water which flowed from the side of Christ, and the fire of the Holy Ghost. Theophylact and Nicephorus condemn the Armenians for not mixing water with the wine. Protestants use wine alone, because there is no scriptural authority for the addition of water.]

WINE-PRESS. The vintage in Syria commences about the middle of September, and continues till the middle of November. But grapes in Palestine, we are informed, were ripe sometimes even in June or July, which arose perhaps from a triple pruning, in which case there was also a third vintage. The first vintage was in August, the second in September, and the third in October. The grapes when not gathered were sometimes found on the vines until November and December. The Hebrews were required to leave gleanings for the poor. Lev. xix. 10. The season of vintage was a most joyful one. Judg. ix. 27: Isa. xvi. 10: Jer. xxv. 30; xlviii. 33. With shoutings on all sides, the grapes were plucked off and carried to the wine-press, פיר, ληνός, which was in the vineyard. Isa. lxiii. 3: Haggai ii. 16: Matt. xxi. 33: Rev. xiv. 19, 20. The presses consisted of two receptacles, which were either built of stones and covered with plaster, or hewn out of a large rock. The upper receptacle, called מא, as it is constructed at the present time in Persia, is nearly eight feet square and four feet high. Into this the grapes are thrown and trodden out by five men. The juice flows out into the lower receptacle, [יקב] through a grated aperture, which is made in the side near the bottom of the upper one. [Joel. iii. 18.] The treading of the wine-press was laborious, and not very favorable to cleanliness; the garments of the persons thus employed were stained with the red juice, and yet the employment was a joyful one. It was performed with singing, accompanied with musical instruments; and the treaders, as they jumped, exclaimed, דוד. Isa. xvi. 9, 10: Jer. xxv. 30; xlviii. 32, 33. Figuratively, vintage, gleaning, and treading the wine-press, signified battles and great slaughters. Isa. xvii. 6; lxiii.

1-3: Jer xlix. 9: Lam. i. 15. The must, as is customary in the east at the present day, was preserved in large firkins, which were buried in the earth. The wine-cellars were not subterranean, but built upon the earth. When deposited in these, the firkins, as is done at the present time in Persia, were sometimes buried in the ground, and sometimes left standing upon it. Formerly, also, new wine or must was preserved in leathern bottles; and, lest they should be broken by fermentation, the people were very careful that the bottles should be new. Job xxxii. 19: Matt. ix. 17: Mark ii. 22. Sometimes the must was boiled and made into syrup, which is comprehended under the term דבש, although it is commonly rendered "honey." Gen. xliii. 11: 2 Chron. xxxi. 5. Sometimes the grapes were dried in the sun and preserved in masses, which were called "bunches or clusters of raisins." 1 Sam. xxv. 18: 2 Sam. xvi. 1: 1 Chron. xii. 40: Hosea iii. 1. From these dried grapes, when soaked in wine and pressed a second time, was manufactured sweet wine, which is also called new wine, γαῖκος. Acts ii. 13.

[WINTER. חורף means the stripping season, and includes both autumn and winter, when the vegetable world is stripped of its fruit and foliage. In Gen. viii. 22: Ps. lxxiv. 17: Zech. xiv. 8, it is opposed to קיץ, which means the waking season, and includes both spring and summer. Winter-houses and summer-houses are spoken of, Jer. xxxvi. 22: Amos iii. 15. חורף is rendered "youth" in Job xxix. 4, because the Hebrews began their year in autumn. See CANAAN.]

WISDOM is put for that prudence and discretion which enables a man to perceive that which is fit to be done, according to the circumstances of time, place, persons, manners, and end of doing. Eccles. ii. 13, 14. It was this sort of wisdom that Solomon entreated of God with so much earnestness, and which God granted him with such Divine liberality. 1 Kings iii. 9, 12, 28. It also signifies quickness of invention, and dexterity in the execution of several works, which require not so much strength of body, as industry and labor of the mind. For example, God told Moses, Exod. xxxi. 3, that he had filled Bezaleel and Aholiab with wisdom, and understanding, and knowledge, to invent and perform several sorts of work for completing the tabernacle. It is used for craft, cunning, and stratagem, and that whether good or evil. Thus it is said by Moses, that Pharaoh dealt wisely with the Israelites, when he opposed them in Egypt, Exodus i. 10: it is observed of Jonadab, the friend of Ammon, and nephew of David, that he was very wise; that is, very subtle and crafty, 2 Sam. xiii. 3; and Job, v. 13, says that God "taketh the wise in their own craftiness." Wisdom means also doctrine, learning, and experience: "With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of days understanding." Job xii. 12. It is put for true piety, or the fear of God, which is spiritual wisdom: "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom," Psalm xc. 12: "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom." Job xxvii. 28. Wisdom is put for the eternal Wisdom, the Word of God. It was by wisdom that God established the heavens, and founded the earth. Prov. iii. 19. How magnificently does Solomon describe the primeval birth of the eternal Son of God, under the character of Wisdom personified, to which so many references and allusions are to be found in the Old and New Testament! "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. When there were no depths, I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water. Before the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth." Prov. viii. 22-25. The apocryphal Book of Wisdom introduces, by a reference to this passage, the following admirable invocation, Wisdom ix. 9, 10:

"O send forth wisdom out of thy holy heavens,
Even from the throne of thy glory;
That being present she may labor with me,
That I may know what is pleasing in thy sight!"

And our Lord assumes the title of Wisdom, Luke xi. 49: Matt. xxiii. 34; and declares that "wisdom shall be justified of all her children." Matt. xi. 19: Luke vii. 35.

WISDOM, BOOK OF, an apocryphal book of Scripture, so called on account of the wise maxims contained in it. This book has been commonly ascribed to Solomon, either because the author imitated the king's manner of writing, or because he sometimes speaks in his name. But it is certain Solomon was not the author of it; for it was not written in Hebrew, nor was it inserted in the Jewish canon, nor is the style like that of Solomon; and therefore St. Jerome observes justly that it smells strong of the Grecian eloquence; that it is composed with art and method, after the manner of the Greek philosophers, very different from the noble simplicity so full of life and energy to be found in the Hebrew books. It has been ascribed by many of the ancients to Philo.

[WISE MEN. See MAGI and STAR IN THE EAST.]

[WITCHCRAFT. כישוף. The pretended discovery of things hidden or future by magical means—sorcery. As various drugs were used for magical purposes, the LXX. translate the word by φάρμακον and its derivatives. So Gal. v. 20: Rev. ix. 21; xviii. 23; xxi. 8; xxii. 15. A male conjurer is called a wizard—a female a witch. Witchcraft is so abominable, that those who practiced it were not allowed to live. Exod. xxii. 18: Deut. xviii. 10: 1 Sam. xxviii.: 2 Kings ix. 22: 1 Chron. x. 13: 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6: Isa. xlvii. 9: Jer. xxvii. 9. See DIVINATION, ENDOR, and NECROMANCY.]

[WITNESS. See JUSTICE.]

[WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT. See HOLY GHOST.]

WOLF, דוב, in Arabic, zeab. Gen. xlix. 27: Isa. xi. 6; lxxv. 25: Jer. v. 6: Ezek. xxxii. 27: Zeph. iii. 3: Hab. i. 8: λύκος, Matt. vii. 15; x. 16: Luke x. 3: John x. 12: Acts xx. 29: Eccles. xiii. 17. M. Majus derives it from the Arabic word zaab or daaba, "to frighten;" and hence, perhaps, the German word dieb, "a thief." The wolf is a fierce, strong, cunning, mischievous, and carnivorous quadruped; externally and internally so nearly resembling the dog, that they seem modelled alike, yet have a perfect antipathy to each other. The Scripture observes of the wolf, that it lives upon rapine; is violent, bloody, cruel, voracious, and greedy; goes abroad by night to seek its prey, and is a great enemy to flocks of sheep. Indeed, this animal is fierce without cause, kills without remorse, and by its indiscriminate slaughter seems to satisfy its malignity rather than its hunger. The wolf is weaker than the lion or the bear, and less courageous than the leopard; but he scarcely yields to them in cruelty and rapaciousness. His ravenous temper prompts him to destructive and sanguinary depredations; and these are perpetrated principally in the night. This circumstance is expressly mentioned in several passages of Scripture: "The great men have altogether broken the yoke and burst the bonds; wherefore, a lion out of the forest shall slay them, and a wolf of the evenings shall spoil them." Jer. v. 6. The rapacious and cruel conduct of the princes of Israel is compared by Ezekiel, xxii. 27, to the mischievous inroads of the same animal: "Her princes in the midst thereof are like wolves ravening the prey, to shed blood, to destroy lives, to get dishonest gain;" and Zephaniah, iii. 3, says, "Her princes within her are roaring lions, her judges are evening wolves: they gnaw not the bones till the morrow." Instead of protecting the innocent and restraining the evil-doer, or punishing him according to the demerit of his crimes, they delight in violence and oppression, in blood and rapine; and so insatiable is their cupidity, that, like the evening wolf, they destroy more than they are able to possess. The dispositions of the wolf to attack the weaker animals, especially those which are under the protection of man, is alluded to by our Saviour in the parable of the hireling shepherd: "The wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep." John x. 12. And the Apostle Paul, in his address to the elders of Ephesus, gives the name of this insidious and cruel animal to the false teachers who disturbed the peace and perverted the faith of their people: "I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock." Acts xx. 29.

[WOMAN. Some derive this word from womb and man; others, from the Anglo-Saxon wif and man, weaving, in old times, being a leading employment of females, as fighting was of males; hence the Anglo-Saxon version of Matt. xix. 4: wep-man and wif-man—weapon-man and web, or woof-man. Woman corresponds with the Hebrew feminine of ish, man, ishshah, a female man. Symmachus has ἀνδρίς, the feminine of ἀνδρῆς; and the Vulgate, virago, the feminine of vir. The word indicates that the woman was designed to be a "help meet" for man—that is, one like himself, save the sexual difference—a female man. Revealed religion, especially Christianity, puts woman into her proper position—apart from its influence she is either a drudge or a toy. Gen. ii. 20-25; iii. 15, 16: Gal. iii. 28; iv. 4: 1 Tim. ii. 9-15. See MOTHER.]

WORD. Sometimes the Scripture ascribes to the word of God certain supernatural effects, and often represents it as animated and active:

"He sent his word and healed them." Ps cvii. 20. It also signifies what is written in the sacred books of the Old and New Testament, Luke xi. 28: James i. 22; the Divine law which teaches and commands good things, and forbids evil, Ps. cxix. 101; and is used to express every promise of God, Ps. cxix. 25, etc., and prophecy or vision, Isa. ii. 1. This term is likewise consecrated and appropriated to signify the only Son of the Father, the uncreated Wisdom, the second Person of the most holy Trinity, equal to and consubstantial with the Father. St. John the evangelist, more expressly than any other, has opened to us the mystery of the Word of God, when he tells us, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made." John i. 1-3. The Chaldee paraphrasts, the most ancient Jewish writers extant, generally make use of the word Memra, which signifies "the Word," in those places where Moses puts the name Jehovah. They say, for example, that it was the Memra, or the Word, which created the world, which appeared to Moses on Mount Sinai, which gave him the law, which spoke to him face to face, which brought Israel out of Egypt, which marched before the people, and which wrought all those miracles that are recorded in Exodus. It was the same Word that appeared to Abraham in the plain of Mamre, that was seen of Jacob at Bethel, to whom Jacob made his vow, and acknowledged as God, saying, "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, then shall the Lord be my God." Gen. xxviii. 20, 21. The manner in which St. John commences his Gospel is strikingly different from the introductions to the histories of Christ by the other evangelists; and no less striking and peculiar is the title under which he announces him—"the Word." It has therefore been a subject of much inquiry and discussion, from whence this evangelist drew the use of this appellation, and what reasons led him, as though intending to solicit particular attention, to place it at the very head of his Gospel. That it was for the purpose of establishing an express opinion as to the personal character of him it is used to designate, is made more than probable from the predominant character of the whole Gospel, which is more copiously doctrinal, and contains a record more full of what Jesus "said," than the others. As to the source from which the term Logos was drawn by the apostle, some have held it to be taken from the Jewish Scriptures; others, from the Chaldee paraphrases; others, from Philo and the Hellenizing Jews. The most natural conclusion certainly appears to be, that, as St. John was a plain, "unlearned" man, chiefly conversant in the Holy Scriptures, he derived this term from the sacred books of his own nation, in which the Hebrew phrase, Dabar Jehovah, "the Word of Jehovah," frequently occurs in passages which must be understood to speak of a personal Word, and which phrase is rendered Λόγος Κυρίου [the Word of the Lord] by the Septuagint interpreters. Certainly, there is not the least evidence in his writings, or in his traditional history, that he ever acquainted himself with Philo or with Plato; and none, therefore, that he borrowed the term from them, or used it in any sense approaching to or suggested by these refinements: in the writings of St. Paul there are allusions to poets and philosophers; in those of St. John, none, except to the rising sects afterward known under the appellation of Gnostics. The Hebrew Scriptures contain frequent intimations of a distinction of Persons in the Godhead; one of these Divine Persons is called Jehovah; and, though manifestly represented as existing distinct from the Father, is yet arrayed with attributes of Divinity, and was acknowledged by the ancient Jews to be, in the highest sense, "their God," the God with whom, through all their history, they chiefly "had to do." This Divine Person is proved to have been spoken of by the prophets as the future Christ; the evangelists and apostles represent Jesus as that Divine Person of the prophets; and if, in the writings of the Old Testament, he is also called the Word, the application of this term to our Lord is naturally accounted for. It will then appear to be a theological, not a philosophic appellation, and one which, previously even to the time of the apostle, had been stamped with the authority of inspiration.

Celebrated as this title of the Logos was in the Jewish theology, it is not, however, the appellation by which the Spirit of inspiration has chosen that our Saviour should be principally designated. It occurs but a very few times, and principally and emphatically in the introduction to St. John's Gospel. A cogent reason can be given why this apostle adopts it; and we are not without a probable reason why, in the New Testament, the title "Son of God" should have been preferred, which is a frequent title of the Logos in the writings also of Philo. Originating from the spiritual principle of connection between the first and the second Being in the Godhead; marking this by a spiritual idea of connection; and considering it to be as close and as necessary as the Word is to the energetic mind of God, which cannot bury its intellectual energies in silence, but must put them forth in speech, it is too spiritual in itself to be addressed to the faith of the multitude. If with so full a reference to our bodily ideas, and so positive a filiation of the second Being to the first, we have seen the attempts of Arian criticism endeavoring to resolve the doctrine into the mere dust of a figure, how much more ready would it have been to do so, if we had only such a spiritual denomination as this for the second! This would certainly have been considered by it as too unsubstantial for distinct personality, and therefore too evanescent for equal Divinity. One of the first teachers of this system was Cerinthus. We have not any particular account of all the branches of his system; and it is possible that we may ascribe to him some of those tenets by which later sects of Gnostics were discriminated. But we have authority for saying that the general principle of the Gnostic scheme was openly taught by Cerinthus before the publication of the Gospel of St. John. The authority is that of Irenæus, a bishop who lived in the second century, who in his youth had heard Polycarp, the disciple of the Apostle John, and who retained the discourses of Polycarp in his memory till his death. There are yet extant of the works of Irenæus, five books which he wrote against heresies, one of the most authentic and valuable monuments of theological erudition. In one place of that work he says that Cerinthus taught in Asia that the world was not made by the Supreme God, but by a certain power very separate and far removed from the Sovereign of the universe, and ignorant of his nature. In another place, he says that John the Apostle wished, by his Gospel, to extirpate the error which had been spread among men by Cerinthus; and Jerome, who lived in the fourth century, says that St. John wrote his Gospel, at the desire of the bishops of Asia, against Cerinthus and other heretics, and chiefly against the doctrines of the Ebionites, then springing up, who said that Christ did not exist before he was born of Mary.

"It appears," says Dr. Hill, "to have been the tradition of the Christian Church, that St. John, who lived to a great age, and who resided at Ephesus, in Proconsular Asia, was moved by the growth of the Gnostic heresies, and by the solicitations of the Christian teachers, to bear his testimony to the truth in writing, and particularly to recollect those discourses and actions of our Lord which might furnish the clearest refutation of the persons who denied his preëxistence. This tradition is a key to a great part of his Gospel. Matthew, Mark, and Luke had given a detail of those actions of Jesus which are the evidences of his Divine mission; of those events in his life upon earth which are most interesting to the human race; and of those moral discourses in which the wisdom, the grace, and the sanctity of the Teacher shine with united lustre. Their whole narration implies that Jesus was more than man. But as it is distinguished by a beautiful simplicity, which adds very much to their credit as historians, they have not, with the exception of a few incidental expressions, formally stated the conclusion that Jesus was more than man; but have left the Christian world to draw it for themselves from the facts narrated, or to receive it by the teaching and the writings of the apostles. St. John, who was preserved by God to see this conclusion, which had been drawn by the great body of Christians, and had been established in the Epistles, denied by different heretics, brings forward, in the form of a history of Jesus, a view of his exalted character, and draws our attention particularly to the truth of that which had been denied. When you come to analyze the Gospel of St. John, you will find that the first eighteen verses contain the positions laid down by the apostle, in order to meet the errors of Cerinthus; that these positions, which are merely affirmed in the introduction, are proved in the progress of the Gospel, by the testimony of John the Baptist, and by the words and the actions of our Lord; and that after the proof is concluded by the declaration of Thomas, who, upon being convinced that Jesus had risen, said to him,

'My Lord and my God,' St. John sums up the amount of his Gospel in these few words: 'These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God;' that is, that Jesus and the Christ are not distinct persons, and that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. The apostle does not condescend to mention the name of Cerinthus, because that would have preserved, as long as the world lasts, the memory of a name which might otherwise be forgotten. But, although there is dignity and propriety in omitting the mention of his name, it was necessary, in laying down the positions that were to meet his errors, to adopt some of his words, because the Christians of those days would not so readily have applied the doctrine of the apostle to the refutation of those heresies which Cerinthus was spreading among them, if they had not found in the exposition of that doctrine some of the terms in which the heresy was delivered; and as the chief of these terms, Logos, which Cerinthus applied to an inferior spirit, was equivalent to a phrase in common use among the Jews, 'the Word of Jehovah,' and was probably borrowed from thence, John by his use of Logos rescues it from the degraded use of Cerinthus, and restores it to a sense corresponding to the dignity of the Jewish phrase."

The Logos was no fanciful term, merely invented by St. John, pro re nata, [according to circumstances,] or even suggested by the Holy Spirit, as a suitable title for a prophet by whom God chose to reveal himself or his Word. It was a term diversely understood in the world before St. John began his Gospel. Is it possible, therefore, that he should have used the term without some express allusion to these prevailing opinions? Had he contradicted them all, it would, of course, have been a plain proof that they were all equally fabulous and fanciful; but by adopting the term, he certainly meant to show that the error did not consist in believing that there was a Logos, or Word of God, but in thinking amiss of it. We might, indeed, have wondered much had he decidedly adopted the Platonic or Gnostic notions, in preference to the Jewish; but that he should harmonize with the latter, is by no means surprising; first, because he was a Jew himself; and, secondly, because Christianity was plainly to be shown to be connected with, and, as it were, regularly to have sprung out of, Judaism. It is certainly, then, in the highest degree consistent with all we could reasonably expect, to find St. John and others of the sacred writers expressing themselves in terms not only familiar to the Jews under the old covenant, but in such as might tend, by a perfect revelation of the truth, to give instruction to all parties; correcting the errors of the Platonic and oriental systems, and confirming in the clearest manner the hopes and expectations of the Jews.

While the reasons for the use of this term by St. John are obvious, the argument from it is irresistible; for, first, the Logos of the evangelist is a person, not an attribute, as many Socinians have said, who have, therefore, sometimes chosen to render it wisdom. For if it be an attribute, it were a mere truism to say, that "it was in the beginning with God;" because God could never be without his attributes. The apostle also declares that the Logos was the Light; but that John Baptist was not the Light. Here is a kind of parallel supposed, and it presumes, also, that it was possible that the same character might be erroneously ascribed to both. Between person and person this may, undoubtedly, be the case; but what species of parallel can exist between man and an attribute? Nor will the difficulty be obviated by suggesting that wisdom here means not the attribute itself, but him whom that attribute inspired, the man Jesus Christ, because the name of our Saviour has not yet been mentioned; because that rule of interpretation must be inadmissible, which at one time would explain the term Logos by an attribute, at another by a man, as best suits the convenience of hypothesis; and because, if it be, in this instance, conceived to indicate our Saviour, it must follow that our Saviour created the world, (which the Unitarians will by no means admit,) for the Logos, who was that which John the Baptist was not, the true Light, is expressly declared to have made the world. Again, the Logos was made flesh, that is, became man; but in what possible sense could an attribute become man? The Logos is "the only-begotten of the Father;" but it would be uncouth to say of any attribute, that it is begotten; and, if that were passed over, it would follow, from this notion, either that God has only one attribute, or that wisdom is not his only-begotten attribute. Further: St. John uses terms decisively personal, as that he is God, not Divine as an attribute, but God personally; not that he was in God, which would properly have been said of an attribute, but with God, which he could only say of a person; that "all things were made by him;" that he was "in the world;" that "he came to his own;" that he was "in the bosom of the Father;" and that "he hath declared the Father." The absurdity of representing the Logos of St. John as an attribute, seems, at length, to have been perceived by the Socinians themselves, and their new version accordingly regards it as a personal term.

If the Logos be a person, then is he Divine; for, first, eternity is ascribed to him: "In the beginning was the Word." The Unitarian comment is, "from the beginning of his ministry," or, "the commencement of the gospel dispensation;" which makes St. John use another trifling truism, and solemnly tell his readers that our Saviour, when he began his ministry, was in existence! "in the beginning of his ministry the Word was!" It is true that ἀρχή, "the beginning," is used for the beginning of Christ's ministry, when he says that the apostles had been with him from the beginning; and it may be used for the beginning of any thing whatever. It is a term which must be determined in its meaning by the context; and the question, therefore, is, how the connection here determines it. Almost immediately it is added, "All things were made by him;" which can only mean the creation of universal nature. He, then, who made all things was prior to all created things; he was when they began to be, and before they began to be; and, if he existed before all created things, he was not himself created, and was, therefore, eternal. Secondly, he is expressly called God; and, thirdly, he is as explicitly said to be the Creator of all things. The last two particulars have often been largely established, and nothing need be added, except, as another proof that the Scriptures can only be fairly explained by the doctrine of a distinction of Divine Persons in the Godhead, the declaration of St. John may be adduced, that "the Word was with God, and the Word was God." What hypothesis but this goes a single step to explain this wonderful language? Arianism, which allows the preëxistence of Christ with God, accords with the first clause, but contradicts the second. Sabellianism, which reduces the personal to an official, and therefore a temporal, distinction, accords with the second clause, but contradicts the first; for Christ, according to this theory, was not with God in the beginning, that is, in eternity. Socinianism contradicts both clauses; for on that scheme Christ was neither with God in the beginning, nor was he God. "The faith of God's elect" agrees with both clauses, and by both it is established: "The Word was with God, and the Word was God." See UNITARIANS.

[WORLD. תִּרְבֵּל. The terraqueous globe; a mixture, as the word imports, of earth and water. 1 Sam. ii. 8: 2 Sam. xxii. 16: 1 Chron. xvi. 30: Prov. viii. 26, 31: Isa. xxxiv. 1. It sometimes denotes a portion of the inhabited earth, Isa. xiv. 17; xxiv. 4, or its inhabitants, Isa. xiii. 11. rendered גִּי, LXX., is used in both these senses, Gen. i. 1, 2; ii. 11, 12, 13; xi. 31; though it designates the earth as distinguished from the water in Gen. i. 10-12. עֲרֵב, rendered world, Ps. lxxiii. 12, means a cycle or age, duration limited or unlimited. These three Hebrew words are all found in Ps. xc. 2. Οἰκουμένη means the inhabited earth, Matt. xxiv. 14: Luke xxi. 26: Rom. x. 18; or a large portion of it, Luke ii. 1: Acts xi. 28; xxiv. 5: Rev. iii. 10; or the inhabitants of the earth, Acts xvii. 6, 31. Οἰκουμένην τὴν μέλλουσαν, the world to come, Heb. ii. 5, means the gospel dispensation. Αἰὼν means a cycle or age, duration limited or unlimited, and particularly of the world, Matt. xiii. 39; xxviii. 20: Luke i. 70: John ix. 32: Acts iii. 21. Ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος means the present life, with various applications, according to the subject, Matt. xiii. 22: Luke xvi. 8; xx. 34: Rom. xii. 2: 1 Cor. i. 20; ii. 6; viii. 13: 2 Cor. iv. 4: Gal. i. 4: Eph. i. 21; ii. 2: 1 Tim. vi. 17: 2 Tim. iv. 20: Titus ii. 12. Ὁ αἰὼν ἐκείνος, Luke xx. 35, means the future state; so does Ὁ αἰὼν δ' ἐρχόμενος, Mark x. 30: Luke xviii. 30; so ὁ αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων, Eph. i. 21. Some think it means an age, or a dispensation, as the Jewish and Christian, in Matt. xii. 32; xxiv. 3: 1 Cor. x. 11: Heb. vi. 5; the plural is used in this sense, 1 Cor. ii. 7: Eph. iii. 9: Col. i. 26: Heb. ix. 26; a cycle of cycles, "world without end," Eph. iii. 21, and cycles of cycles, "for ever and ever," 1 Tim. i. 17. In Heb. i. 2; xi. 3, the plural seems to allude to the earth and other orbs of the material universe; so some construe τῶν αἰώνων, 1 Tim. i. 17, which we render "the King eternal," the King of the universe. Κόσμος, from κοσμέω, to set in order, to adorn, (compare 1 Pet. iii. 3, 5,) is defined by Aristotle, "a system composed of the heaven and of the earth, and of the beings contained in them; or it is the order and beautiful arrangement of the universe." So the Latin mundus. It has this meaning in Matt. xxiv. 21: John xvii. 5: Acts xvii. 24: Rom. i. 20. It means the earth in Matt. xiii. 38: Mark xiv. 9: Luke xii. 30: 2 Pet. ii. 5; iii. 6; or a portion of it, as Canaan, Matt. iv. 8: (οἰκουμένη, Luke iv. 5:) Rom. iv. 13, and the Roman empire, Rom. i. 8. It means the whole race of mankind inhabiting the world, John iii. 16, 17; vi. 33; xii. 47: Rom. iii. 19: 2 Cor. v. 19: 1 John ii. 2; or the wicked part of it, being the greater number, John vii. 7; xv. 18, 19; xvi. 20; xvii. 14: Rom. xii. 2: 1 Cor. xi. 32: 1 John ii. 15-17; iii. 1, 13; iv. 5; v. 19; or the Gentiles, as opposed to the Jews, Rom. xi. 12; or a great number of persons, le monde, John vii. 4; xii. 19: compare James iii. 6. It seems to mean the things of the world, wealth, honor, and pleasure, in 1 Cor. vii. 31: Gal. vi. 14.]

WORM, the general name in Scripture for little creeping insects. Several kinds are spoken of: 1. Those that breed in putrefied bodies, רֶמֶס, Exod. xvi. 20, 24: Job vii. 5; xvii. 14; xxi. 26; xxiv. 20; xxv. 6: Isa. xiv. 11; σκώληξ, Eccles. vii. 17; x. 11: 1 Macc. ii. 62: 2 Macc. ix. 9: Judith xvi. 17: Mark ix. 44, 46, 48: Acts xii. 23. 2. That which eats woollen garments, טֵרֵם, Isa. li. 8; σῆς, Matt. vi. 19, 20: Luke xii. 33. 3. That which, perforating the leaves and bark of trees, causes the little excrescences called kermes, whence is made a crimson dye, רִמְלֵה, Deut. xxviii. 39: Job xxv. 6: Ps. xxii. 6: Isa. xiv. 11; xli. 14; lxxvi. 24: Exod. xvi. 20: Jonah iv. 7. 4. The worm destructive of the vines, referred to in Deut. xxviii. 39; which was the pyralis vitanae, or pyralis fusciana, of Forskal, the vine weevil, a small insect extremely hurtful to the vines.

WORMWOOD, לְחָנִי, Deut. xxix. 18: Prov. v. 4: Jer. ix. 15; xiii. 15: Lam. iii. 15, 19: Amos v. 7; vi. 12; ἄψινθος, Rev. viii. 11. In the Septuagint the original word is variously rendered, and generally by terms expressive of its figurative sense, for what is offensive, odious, or deleterious; but in the Syriac and Arabic versions, and in the Latin Vulgate, it is rendered "wormwood;" and this is adopted by Celsius, who names it the absinthium santonicum Judaicum, [bitter wormwood of Judea.] From the passages of Scripture, however, where this plant is mentioned, something more than the bitterness of its qualities seems to be intimated, and effects are attributed to it greater than can be produced by the wormwood of Europe. The Chaldee paraphrase gives it even the character of "the wormwood of death." It may therefore mean a plant allied, perhaps, to the absinthium in appearance and in taste, but possessing more nauseous, hurtful, and formidable properties.

WORSHIP. The scriptural obligation of public worship is partly founded upon example, and partly upon precept; so that no person who admits that authority can question this great duty without manifest and criminal inconsistency. The institution of public worship under the law, and the practice of synagogue-worship among the Jews, from at least the time of Ezra, cannot be questioned; both of which were sanctioned by the practice of our Lord and his apostles. The preceptive authority for our regular attendance upon public worship is either inferential or direct. The command to publish the gospel includes the obligation of assembling to hear it; the name by which a Christian society is designated in Scripture is a Church; which signifies an assembly for the transaction of business; and, in the case of a Christian assembly, that business must necessarily be spiritual, and include the sacred exercises of prayer, praise, and hearing the Scriptures. But we have more direct precepts, although the practice was obviously continued from Judaism, and was therefore consuetudinary. Some of the Epistles of St. Paul are commanded to be read in the churches. The singing of psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs is enjoined as an act of solemn worship to the Lord; and St. Paul cautions the Hebrews that they "forsake not the assembling of themselves together." The practice of the primitive age is also manifest from the Epistles of St. Paul. The Lord's Supper was celebrated by the body of believers collectively; and this apostle prescribes to the Corinthians regulations for the exercises of prayer and prophesyings, "when they came together in the church,"—the assembly. The stateness and order of these holy offices in the primitive Church, appear also from the apostolical epistle of St. Clement: "We ought also, looking into the depths of the Divine knowledge, to do all things in order, whatsoever the Lord hath commanded to be done. We ought to make our oblations, and perform our holy offices, at their appointed seasons; for these he hath commanded to be done, not irregularly or by chance, but at determinate times and hours; as he hath likewise ordained by his supreme will, where, and by what persons, they shall be performed; that so all things being done according to his pleasure, may be acceptable in his sight." This passage is remarkable for urging a Divine authority for the public services of the Church, by which St. Clement, no doubt, means the authority of the inspired directions of the apostles. The ends of the institution of public worship are of such obvious importance, that it must ever be considered as one of the most condescending and gracious dispensations of God to man. By this his Church confesses his name before the world; by this the public teaching of his word is associated with acts calculated to affect the mind with that solemnity which is the best preparation for hearing it to edification. It is thus that the ignorant and the vicious are collected together, and instructed and warned; the invitations of mercy are published to the guilty, and the sorrowful and afflicted are comforted. In these assemblies God, by his Holy Spirit, diffuses his vital and sanctifying influence, and takes the devout into a fellowship with himself, from which they derive strength to do and to suffer his will in the various scenes of life, while he there affords them a foretaste of the deep and hallowed pleasures which are reserved for them at his right hand for evermore. Prayers and intercessions are offered for national and public interests; and while the benefit of these exercises descends upon a country, all are kept sensible of the dependence of every public and personal interest upon God. Praise calls forth the grateful emotions, and gives cheerfulness to piety; and that instruction in righteousness which is so perpetually repeated, diffuses the principles of morality and religion throughout society; enlightens and gives activity to conscience; raises the standard of morals; attaches shame to vice, and praise to virtue; and thus exerts a powerfully purifying influence upon mankind. Laws thus receive a force which in other circumstances they could not acquire, even were they enacted in as great perfection; and the administration of justice is aided by the strongest possible obligation and sanction being given to legal oaths. The domestic relations are rendered more strong and interesting by the very habit of the attendance of families upon the sacred services of the sanctuary of the Lord; and the rich and the poor meeting together, and standing on the same common ground as sinners before God, equally dependent upon him, and equally suing for his mercy, has a powerful, though often an insensible, influence in humbling the pride which is nourished by superior rank, and in raising the lower classes above abjectness of spirit, without injuring their humility. Piety, benevolence, and patriotism are equally dependent for their purity and vigor upon the regular and devout worship of God in the simplicity of the Christian dispensation.

The following is an abridgment of Dr. Neander's account of the mode of conducting public worship among the primitive Christians, which, though questionable on some points, is upon the whole just and interesting:—Since the religion of the New Testament did not admit of any peculiar outward priesthood, similar to that of the Old, the same outward kind of worship, dependent on certain places, times, and outward actions and demeanors, would also have no place in its composition. The kingdom of God, the temple of the Lord, were to be present, not in this or that place, but in every place where Christ himself is active in the Spirit, and where through him the worship of God in spirit and in truth is established. Every Christian in particular, and every Church in general, were to represent a spiritual temple of the Lord; the true worship of God was to be only in the inward heart, and the whole life proceeding from such inward disposition, sanctified by faith, was to be a continued spiritual service; this is the great fundamental idea of the gospel, which prevails throughout the New Testament, by which the whole outward appearance of religion was to assume a different form, and all that once was carnal was to be converted into spiritual, and ennobled. This notion came forward most strongly in the original inward life of the first Christians, particularly when contrasted with Judaism, and still more so when contrasted with heathenism; a contrast which taught the Christians to avoid all pomp that caught the eye, and all multiplication of means of devotion addressed to the senses, while it made them hold fast the simple, spiritual character of the Christian worship of God. It was this which always struck the heathen so much in the Christian worship; namely, that nothing was found among them of the outward pomp of all other religions—no temples, no altars, no images. This reproach was made to the Christians by Celsus, and answered thus by Origen: "In the highest sense the temple and image of God are in the human nature of Christ; and hence, also, in all the faithful, who are animated by the spirit of Christ—living images! with which no statue of Jove by Phidias is fit to be compared." Christianity impelled men frequently to seek for the stillness of the inward sanctuary, and here to pour forth their heart to God, who dwells in such temples; but then the flames of love were also lighted in their hearts, which sought communion in order to strengthen each other mutually, and to unite themselves into one holy flame which pointed toward heaven. The communion of prayer and devotion was thought a source of sanctification, inasmuch as men knew that the Lord was present by his Spirit among those who were gathered together in his name; but then they were far from ascribing any peculiar sacredness and sanctity to the place of assembly. Such an idea would appear to partake of heathenism; and men were at first in less danger of being seduced into such an idea, because the first general places of assembly of the Christians were only common rooms in private houses, just according as it happened that any member of the Church had sufficient accommodation for the purpose. Thus Gaius of Corinth, Rom. xvi., is called the host of the Church, because the Church was in the habit of assembling in a room of his house. Origen says, "The place where believers come together to pray has something agreeable and useful about it;" but then he only says this in respect to that spiritual communion. Man, we must avow, is very easily led to fall away from the worship of God in spirit and in truth, and to connect the religion of the Spirit with outward and earthly things; as the apostle says, "Having begun in the Spirit, to wish to end in the flesh." Watchfulness on this point was constantly needed, lest the Jewish or the heathen notions should here intrude themselves on those of the gospel, which was likely enough to happen as soon as the Old and the New Testament notions of the priesthood had been confused. Even in the time of Clemens of Alexandria, he found himself obliged to combat the notion which allowed the essentials of a Christian life to be of one kind in, and of another out of, the church. "The disciples of Christ," he says, "must form the whole course of their life and conduct on the model which they assume in the churches, for the sake of propriety; they must be such, and not merely seem so; as mild, as pious, and as charitable. But now, I know not how it is, they change their habits and their manners with the change of place, as the polypus, they say, changes its color, and becomes like the rock on which it hangs. They lay aside the spiritual habit which they had assumed in the church, as soon as they have left the church, and assimilate themselves to the multitude among whom they live. I should rather say, that they convict themselves of hypocrisy, and show what they really are in their inward nature, by laying aside the mask of piety which they had assumed; and while they honor the word of God, they leave it behind them in the place where they heard it."

The Christian places of assembly were, at first, in the rooms of private houses; it may perhaps be the case, that in large towns, where the number of Christians was soon considerable, and no member of the Church had any room in his house sufficient to contain all his brethren, or in places where men did not fear any prejudicial consequences from large assemblies, the Church divided itself into different sections, according to the habitations of its members, of which each section held its assemblies in one particular chamber of the house of some wealthy member of the Church; or, perhaps, while it was usual to unite on Sundays in one general assembly, yet each individual part of the Church met together daily in the rooms which lay the most convenient to it. Perhaps the passages in St. Paul's Epistles which speak of churches in the houses of particular persons, are thus to be understood. The answer of Justin Martyr to the question of the prefect, "Where do you assemble?" exactly corresponds to the genuine Christian spirit on this point. This answer was, "Where each one can and will. You believe, no doubt, that we all meet together in one place; but it is not so, for the God of the Christians is not shut up in a room, but, being invisible, he fills both heaven and earth, and is honored everywhere by the faithful." Justin adds, that when he came to Rome, he was accustomed to dwell in one particular spot, and that those Christians who were instructed by him, and wished to hear his discourses, assembled at his house. He had not visited any other congregations of the Church. The arrangements which the peculiarities of the Christian worship required, were gradually made in these places of assembly, such as an elevated seat for the purpose of reading the Scriptures and preaching, a table for the distribution of the sacrament, to which, as early as the time of Tertullian, the name of altar, ara or allare, was given, and perhaps not without some mixture of the unevangelical Old Testament notion of a sacrifice; or at least this idea might easily attach itself to this name. When the Churches increased, and their circumstances improved, there were, during the course of the third century, already separate church buildings for the Christians, as the name θρησκευτήριον τόπος [religious places] of the Christians occurs in the edict of Gallienus. In the time of the external prosperity of the Church, during the reign of Diocletian, many handsome churches arose in the great towns. The use of images was originally quite foreign to the Christian worship and churches, and it remained so during this whole period. The intermixture of art and religion, and the use of images for the latter, appeared to the first Christians a heathenish practice. As in heathenism the Divine becomes desecrated and tarnished by intermixture with the natural; and as men have often paid homage to the beauties of nature, with injury to the cause of holiness, the first warmth of Christian zeal, which opposed the idolatry of nature, so common to heathenism, and sought to maintain the Divine in all its purity and elevation, was inclined rather to set holiness in the strongest contrast with what is beautiful by nature, than to endeavor to grace it by lending it a beautiful form. Men were more inclined in general to carry into extremes the idea of the appearance of the Divinity in the form of a servant, which suited the oppressed condition of the Church in these centuries, than to throw it into the background, and overwhelm it under the predominance of their æsthetic dispositions, and their love of art. This is peculiarly shown by the general belief of the early Church, that Christ had clothed his inward Divine glory in a mean outward form, which was in direct contradiction to it; a conclusion which was drawn from interpreting the prophecy of the Messiah in Isa. liii. 2 too literally. Thus, Clemens of Alexandria warns the Christians, from the example of Christ, not to attribute too much value to outward beauty: "The Lord himself was mean in outward form; and who is better than the Lord? But he revealed himself not in the beauty of the body, perceptible to our senses, but in the true beauty of the soul, as well as of the body; the beauty of the soul consisting in benevolence, and that of the body in immortality!" Fathers of entirely opposite habits of mind, the adherents of two different systems of conceiving Divine things, were nevertheless united on this point by their common opposition to the mixture of the natural and the Divine in heathenism, and by the endeavor to maintain the devotion to God, in spirit and in truth, pure and undefiled. Clemens of Alexandria is as little favorable as Tertullian to the use of images. Heathens who, like Alexander Severus, saw something Divine in Christ's personal form, and sects which mixed heathenism and Christianity together, were the first who made use of images of Christ; as, for instance, the Gnostic sect of the followers of Carpocratian, who put his image beside those of Plato and Aristotle. The use of religious images among the Christians did not proceed from their ecclesiastical but from their domestic life. In the intercourse of daily life, the Christians saw themselves everywhere surrounded by objects of heathen mythology, or by such as shocked their moral and Christian feelings. Similar objects adorned the walls of chambers, the drinking-vessels, and the signet rings, (on which the heathen had constantly idolatrous images,) to which, whenever they pleased, they could address their devotions; and the Christians naturally felt themselves obliged to replace these objects, which wounded their moral and religious feelings, with others more suited to those feelings. Therefore, they gladly put the likeness of a shepherd carrying a lamb upon his shoulders, on their cups, as a symbol of the Redeemer, who saves the sinners that return to him, according to the parable in the Gospel. And Clemens of Alexandria says, in reference to the signet rings of the Christians, "Let our signet rings consist of a dove," the emblem of the Holy Ghost, "or a fish, or a ship sailing toward heaven," the emblem of the Christian Church, or of individual Christian souls, "or a lyre," the emblem of Christian joy, "or an anchor," the emblem of Christian hope; "and he who is a fisherman, let him remember the apostle, and the children who were dragged out from the water; for those men ought not to engrave idolatrous forms, to whom the use of them is forbidden; those can engrave no sword and no bow, who seek for peace; the friends of temperance cannot engrave drinking-cups." And yet, perhaps, religious images made their way from domestic life into the Churches as early as the end of the third century, and the walls of the churches were painted in the same way. The Council of Elvira set itself against this innovation as an abuse, for it made the following order: "Objects of reverence and worship shall not be painted on the walls." It is probable that the visible representation of the cross found its way very early into domestic and ecclesiastical life. This token was remarkably common among them; it was used to consecrate their rising and their going to bed, their going out and their coming in, and all the actions of daily life; it was the sign which Christians made involuntarily whenever any thing of a fearful nature surprised them. This was a mode of expressing, by means perceptible to the senses, the purely Christian idea, that all the actions of Christians, as well as the whole course of their life, must be sanctified by faith in the crucified Jesus, and by dependence upon him; and that this faith is the most powerful means of conquering all evil, and preserving oneself against it. But here also, again, men were too apt to confuse the idea and the token which represented it; and they attributed the effects of faith in the crucified Redeemer to the outward sign, to which they ascribed a supernatural, sanctifying, and preservative power; an error of which we find traces as early as the third century.

We now pass from the consideration of the places of public worship, to that of the seasons of worship, and the festivals of the early Christians. It is here shown again, that the gospel, as it remodelled the former conceptions of the priesthood, of worship in general, and of holy places, also entirely changed the then views of sacred seasons. And here again, also, the character of the theocracy of the New Testament revealed itself, a theocracy spiritualized, ennobled, and freed from its outward garb of sense, and from the limits which bounded its generalization. The Jewish laws relating to their festivals were not merely abrogated by the gospel in such a manner as to transfer these festivals to different seasons; but they were entirely abolished, as far as fixing religious worship to particular times is concerned. St. Paul expressly declares all sanctifying of certain seasons, as far as men deduced this from the Divine command, to be Jewish and unevangelical, and to be like returning to the slavery of the law, and to captivity to outward precepts. Such was the opinion of the early Church. At first the Churches assembled every day; as, for instance, the first Church of Jerusalem, which assembled daily for prayer in common, and for the public consideration of the Divine word, for the common celebration of the Lord's Supper and the agapæ, as well as to maintain the connection between the common head of the spiritual body of the Church and themselves, and between one another as members of this body. Traces of this are also found in later times in the daily assembling of the Churches for the purpose of hearing the Scriptures read, and of celebrating the communion. Although, in order to meet the wants of human nature generally, consisting as it does of sense as well as soul, and those of a large body of Christians in particular, who were only in a state of education, and were to be brought up to the ripeness of Christian manhood, men soon selected definite times (beside the authorized Christian Sabbath, the first day of the week) for religious admonitions, and to consecrate them to a fuller occupation with religious things, as well as to public devotion, with the intention that the influence of these definite times should animate and sanctify the rest of their lives, and that Christians who withdrew themselves from the distractions of business on these days, and collected their hearts before God in the stillness of solitude, as well as in public devotion, might make these seasons of service to the other parts of their life; yet this was in itself, and of itself, nothing unevangelical. It was only a dropping down from the purely spiritual point of view on which even the Christian, as he still carries about two natures in himself, cannot always maintain himself, to the carnal; a dropping down which became constantly more necessary, the more the fire of the first animation and the warmth of the first love of the Christians died away. It was no more unevangelical than the gradual limitation of the exercise of many rights belonging to the common priesthood of all Christians, to a certain class in the Church, which circumstances rendered necessary. But just as the unevangelical made its appearance, men supposed certain days distinguished from others, and hallowed by Divine right, when they introduced a distinction between holy and common days into the life of the Christian, and in this distinction forgot his calling to sanctify all days alike. When the Monitans wished to introduce and make imperative new fasts, which were fixed to certain days, the Epistle to the Galatians was very properly brought to oppose them; but Tertullian, who stood on the boundary between the original pure evangelic times and those when the intermixture of Jewish and Christian notions first took place, confuses here the views of the two religions, because he makes the evangelical to consist, not in a wholly different method of considering festivals altogether, but in the celebration of different particular festivals; and he makes the Judaizing, which the apostle condemns, to consist only in the observation of the Jewish instead of the peculiarly Christian festivals. The weekly and the yearly festivals originally arose from the self-same fundamental idea, which was the centre-point of the whole Christian life—the idea of imtating Christ, the crucified and the risen; to follow him in his death, by appropriating to ourselves, in penitence and faith, the effects of his death, by dying to ourselves and to the world; to follow him in his resurrection by rising again with him, by faith in him and by his power, to a new and holy life, devoted to God, which, beginning here below in the seed, is matured in heaven. Hence, the festival of joy was the festival of the resurrection; and the preparation for it, the remembrance of the sufferings of Christ, with mortification and crucifixion of the flesh, was the day of fasting and penitence. Thus in the week the Sunday was the joyful festival; and the preparation for it was a day of penitence and prayer, consecrated to remembrance of the sufferings of Christ and the preparations for them, and this was celebrated on the Friday; and thus also the yearly festivals were to celebrate the resurrection of Christ, and the operations of the Redeemer after he had risen again; the preparation for this day was in commemoration of the sufferings and fastings of our Saviour. Allusion is made to Sunday under the character of a festival, as a symbol of a new life consecrated to the Lord, in opposition to the old Sabbath, in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Magnesians: "If they who were brought up under the Old Testament have attained to a new hope, and no longer keep [Jewish] Sabbaths holy, but have consecrated their life to the day of the Lord, on which also our life rose up in him, how shall we be able to live without him?" Sunday was distinguished as a day of joy by the circumstances, that men did not fast upon it, and that they prayed standing up, and not kneeling, as Christ had raised up fallen man to heaven again through his resurrection. And further: two other days in the week, Friday and Wednesday, particularly the former, were consecrated to the remembrance of the sufferings of Christ, and of the circumstances preparatory to them; congregations were held on them, and a fast till three o'clock in the afternoon, but nothing was positively appointed concerning them; in respect to joining in these solemnities, every one consulted his own convenience or inclination. Such fasts, joined with prayer, were considered as the watches of the milites Christi [soldiers of Christ] on their post by the Christians, who compared their calling to a warfare, the militia Christi, and they were stationes, and the days on which they took place were called dies stationum, [day of their stations.] The Churches, which were a graft of a Christian on a Jewish spirit, although they received the Sunday, retained also that of the Sabbath; and from them the custom spread abroad in the oriental Church, of distinguishing this day, as well as the Sunday, by not fasting, and by praying in an erect posture: in the western Churches, particularly the Roman, where opposition to Judaism was the prevailing tendency, this very opposition produced the custom of celebrating the Saturday in particular as a fast-day. This difference in customs would of course be striking, where members of the oriental Church spent their Sabbath day in the western Church. It was only too soon that men lost sight of the apostolic Church, which retained the unity of faith and spirit in the bond of love, but allowed all kinds of difference in external things; and then they began to require uniformity in these things. The first yearly festivals of the Christians proceeded from similar views; and at first the contrast which had in early times the most powerful influence on the development as well of the churchly life as of the doctrines of Christianity, is peculiarly prominent; I mean the contrast between the Jewish Churches and those of the Gentile converts. The former retained all the Jewish festivals as well as the whole ceremonial law; although by degrees they introduced into them a Christian meaning which spontaneously offered itself. On the contrary, there was probably no yearly festival at all, from the beginning, among the heathen converts; for no trace of any thing of the sort is found in the whole of the New Testament. The passover of the Old Testament was easily ennobled and converted to a passover which suited the New Testament, by merely substituting the idea of deliverance from spiritual bondage, that is, from the slavery of sin, for that of deliverance from earthly bondage. The paschal lamb was a type of Christ, by whom that deliverance was wrought. These representations went on the supposition that Christ had partaken his last meal with his disciples, as a proper passover, at the very time that the Jews were celebrating theirs. This passover was, therefore, always celebrated on the night between the fourteenth and fifteenth of the Jewish month Nisan, as a remembrance at the same time of the last supper of Christ. This was the fundamental notion of the whole Jewish Christian passover, on which all the rest was built. The day following this passover was consecrated to the remembrance of the sufferings of Christ, and the third day from it to the remembrance of his resurrection. On the contrary, in the greater number of heathen Churches, as soon as men began to celebrate yearly festivals, (a time which cannot be determined very precisely,) they followed the method observed in the weekly festivals. They appointed one Sunday in the year for the festival of the resurrection, and one Friday as a day of penitence and fasting preparatory to this Sunday, in remembrance of the sufferings of Christ; and they gradually lengthened this time of penitence and fasting, as a preparation for that high and joyful festival. In these Churches they were more inclined to take up a kind of antithetical turn against the Jewish festivals, than to graft Christian ones upon them. It was far from their notions to think of observing a yearly passover with the Jews. The following was the view which they took of the matter: "Every typical feast has lost its true meaning by the realization of that which is typified: in the sacrifice of Christ, the Lord's Supper, as the new covenant, has taken the place of that of the old covenant." This difference of outward customs between the Jewish Christian Churches and the Churches allied to them, on the one hand, and the heathen Christian Churches founded by St. Paul on the other, existed at first without its being supposed that external things of this nature were of importance enough to lead to a controversy. A fast formed the introduction to the passover; and this was the only fast formally established by the Church. The necessity of this fast was deduced from Matt. ix. 15; but it was by a carnal interpretation of the passage, and an application of it quite contrary to its real sense; for it does not relate to the time of Christ's suffering, but to the time when he should be with his disciples no more. As long as they enjoyed his society they were to give themselves up to joy, and to be disturbed in it by no forced asceticism. But a time of sorrow was to follow this time of joy, although only for a season, after which a time of higher and imperishable joy, in invisible communion with him, was to follow. John xvi. 22. The duration of this fast, however, was not determined; the imitation of the temptation of our Lord for forty days introduced the custom of fasting forty hours in some places, which afterward was extended to forty days; and thus the fast of forty days, the quadragesimal fast, arose. The festival of pentecost, Whitsuntide, was closely connected with that of the resurrection; and this was dedicated to commemorating the first visible effects of the operations of the glorified Christ upon human nature, now also ennobled by him, the lively proofs of his resurrection and reception into glory; and therefore Origen joins the festivals of the resurrection and of pentecost together as one whole. The means of transition from an Old Testament festival to one befitting the New Testament, were here near at hand: the first-fruits of harvest in the kingdom of nature—the first-fruits of harvest in the kingdom of grace; the law of the letter from Mount Sinai—the law of the Spirit from the heavenly Jerusalem. This festival originally embraced the whole season of fifty days from Easter, and was celebrated like a Sunday, that is to say, no fasts were kept during the whole of it, and men prayed standing, and not kneeling; and perhaps also in some places assemblies of the Church were held, and the communion was celebrated every day. Afterward, two peculiar points of time, the ascension of Christ, and the effusion of the Holy Spirit, were selected from this whole interval. These were the only festivals generally celebrated at that time, as the passage cited from Origen proves. The fundamental notion of the whole Christian life, which referred every thing to the suffering, the resurrection, and the glorification of Christ, as well as the adherence, or, on the other hand, the opposition to the Jewish celebration of festivals, were the cause that these were the only general festivals. The notion of a birthday festival was far from the ideas of the Christians of this period in general: they looked upon the second birth as the true birth of men. The case must have been somewhat different with the birth of the Redeemer: human nature was to be sanctified by him from its first development; but then this last notion could not at first come so prominently forward among the early Christians, because so many of them were first converted to Christianity when well advanced in years, after some decisive excitement of their life; but then it may have entered generally into domestic life, though at first gradually. Nevertheless, we find in this period apparently one trace of Christmas as a festival. Its history is intimately connected with the history of a kindred festival—the festival of the manifestation of Jesus in his character of Messiah, his consecration to the office of Messiah by the baptism of John, and the beginning of his public ministry as the Messiah, which was afterward called Epiphany, the ἐορτὴ τῶν ἐπιφανίων, or τῆς ἐπιφανείας τοῦ Χριστοῦ, [the festival of Epiphany, or of the appearance of Christ.] We find in later times that these festivals extended themselves in opposite directions, that of Christmas spreading from west to east, and the other from east to west. Clemens of Alexandria merely relates that the Gnostic sect of the Basilidians celebrated the festival of the Epiphany at Alexandria in his time. We can hardly suppose that this sect invented the festival, although they may have had some dogmatical reason for celebrating it; for it is highly improbable that the catholic Church should have afterward received a festival from the Gnostics; and these Gnostics most probably received it from the Jewish Christian Churches in Palestine or Syria. For this time of our Saviour's life would appear the most important to the notions of the Jewish Christians; and the Gnostics would afterward explain it according to their own ideas.

The character of a spiritual worship of God distinguished the Christian worship from that of other religions, which consisted in symbolical pageantry and lifeless ceremonies. As a general elevation of spirit and sanctification of heart was the object of every thing in this religion, instruction and edification, through a common study of the Divine word, and through prayer in common, were the leading features in the Christian worship. And in this respect it might in its form adhere to the arrangements made about the congregations in the Jewish synagogues, in which also the element of a spiritual religious worship was the prevailing ingredient. As the reading of portions of the Old Testament had formed the groundwork of religious instruction in the Jewish synagogues, this custom also passed into the Christian congregations. First the Old Testament, and especially the prophetic parts of it, were read as things that pointed to the Messiah; then followed the Gospels, and after that the Epistles of the apostles. The reading of the Scriptures was of still greater consequence then, because it was desirable that every Christian should be acquainted with them; and yet, by reason of the rarity and dearth of manuscripts, and the poverty of a great proportion of the Christians, or perhaps also because all were not able to read, the Bible itself could not be put into the hands of all. Frequent hearing was therefore with many to supply the place of their own reading. The Scriptures were therefore read in the language which all could understand, and that was, in most parts of the Roman empire, the Greek or the Latin. In very early times different translations of the Bible into Latin were in existence; as every one who knew a little of Greek, found it needful to have his own Bible in his own mother tongue. In places where the Greek or the Latin language was understood only by a part of the Church, that is to say, by the educated classes, while the rest understood only their native language, as was the case in many Egyptian and Syrian towns, church-interpreters were appointed, as in the Jewish synagogues, and they immediately translated what had been read into the language of the country, so that it might be intelligible to all. After the reading of the Scripture there followed, as there had previously in the Jewish synagogues, short, and at first very simple, addresses in familiar language, the momentary effusions of the heart, which contained an explanation and application of what had just been read. Justin Martyr expresses himself thus on the subject: "After the reading of the Scriptures, the president instructs the people in a discourse, and incites them to the imitation of these good examples." Among the Greeks, where the taste was more rhetorical, the sermon from the very earliest times was of a more lengthened kind, and formed a very important part of the service. Singing also passed from the Jewish service into that of the Christian Church. St. Paul exhorts the early Churches to sing spiritual songs. What was used for this purpose were partly the Psalms of the Old Testament, and partly songs composed with this very object, especially songs of praise and thanks to God and Christ; and these, we know, Pliny found to be customary among the Christians. In the controversies with the Unitarians, about the end of the second century and the beginning of the third, the hymns, in which from early times Christ had been honored as a God, were appealed to. The power of church-singing over the heart was soon recognized; and hence those who wished to propagate any peculiar opinions, like Bardasanes, or Paul of Samosata, endeavored to spread them by means of hymns. In compliance with the infirmities of human nature, composed as it is of sense and spirit, the Divine Founder of the Church, beside his word, ordained two outward signs, as symbols of the invisible communion which existed between him, the Head of the spiritual body, and the faithful, its members; and also of the connection of these members, as with him, so also with one another. These were visible means to represent the invisible, heavenly benefits to be bestowed on the members of this body through him; and while man received in faith the sign presented to his senses, the enjoyment of that heavenly communion and those heavenly advantages was to gladden his inward heart. As nothing in all Christianity and in the whole Christian life stands isolated, but all forms one whole, proceeding from one centre, therefore, also, that which this outward sign represented must be something which should continue through the whole of the inward Christian life; something which, spreading itself forth from this one moment over the whole Christian life, should be capable of being especially excited again and promoted in return, by the influence of isolated moments. Thus, baptism was to be the sign of a first entrance into communion with the Redeemer, and with the Church, the first appropriation of those advantages which Christ has bestowed on man, namely, of the forgiveness of sins, and the inward union of life, which proceeds from it, as well as of the participation in a sanctifying Divine Spirit of life. And the Lord's Supper was to be the sign of a constant continuance in this communion, in the appropriation and enjoyment of these advantages; and thus were represented the essentials of the whole inward Christian life, in its earliest rise and its continued progress. The whole peculiar spirit of Christianity was particularly stamped in the mode in which these external things were administered; and the mode of their administration in return exerted a powerful influence on the whole nature of the Christian worship. The connection of the moments, represented by these signs, with the whole Christian life, the connection of inward and Divine things with the outward act, was present to the lively Christian feelings of the first Christians.

[Προσκυνέω means to worship by prostration, the eastern mode of performing civil reverence, Matt. xviii. 26, and religious homage, Matt. iv. 9, 10. As the Romans did not perform civil reverence in this way, Peter would not allow Cornelius to prostrate himself before him, lest it might sanction idolatry. Cornelius seemed to have been disposed to pay this external religious worship to Peter as the representative of God. Acts x. 25. Compare Rev. xxii. 8, 9. Δόξα, rendered worship, Luke xiv. 10, means honor.]

WRITING. In regard to alphabetic writing, all the ancient writers attribute the invention of it to some very early age, and some country of the east; but they do not pretend to designate precisely either the time or the place. They say, further, that Cadmus introduced letters from Phenicia into Greece, if we may credit the Parisian Chronicle, B. C. 1519, that is, forty-five years after the death of Moses. Anticlides asserts, and attempts to prove, that letters were invented in Egypt fifteen years before Phoroneus, the most ancient king of Greece; that is, four hundred and nine years after the deluge, and in the one hundred and seventeenth year of Abraham. On this it may be remarked, that they might have been introduced into Egypt at this time, but they had been previously invented by the Phenicians. Epigenes, who, in the estimation of Pliny, is weighty authority, informs us that observations made upon the heavenly bodies for seven hundred and twenty years at Babylon, were written down upon baked tiles; but Berossus and Critodemus, also referred to by Pliny, make the number of years four hundred and eighty. Pliny from these statements draws the conclusion that the use of letters, as he expresses it, must have been eternal, that is, beyond all records. Simplicius, who lived in the fifth century, states, on the authority of Porphyry, an acute historian, that Callisthenes, the companion of Alexander, found at Babylon a record of observations on the heavenly bodies for one thousand nine hundred and three years. Of course the record must have been begun B. C. 2234, that is, the eighty-ninth year of Abraham. This statement receives some confirmation from the fact that the month of March is called Adar in the Chaldaic dialect; and at the time mentioned, namely, the eighty-ninth year of Abraham, the sun, during the whole month of March, was in the sign of the zodiac called Aries, or the Ram. The word Adar means the same with Aries. But, as letters would be unquestionably first used for the purposes of general intercourse, they must have been known long before they were employed to transmit the motions of the stars. Of this we have an evidence in the bill of sale which, as we have reason to suppose from the expressions used in Gen. xxiii. 20, was given to Abraham by the sons of Heth. Hence it is not at all wonderful that books and writings are spoken of in the time of Moses, as if well known. Exod. xvii. 14; xxiv. 4; xxviii. 9-11; xxxii. 32; xxxiv. 27, 28; Num. xxxiii. 2; Deut. xxvii. 8. Nor is it a matter of surprise that long before his time there had been public scribes, who kept written genealogies: they were called by the Hebrews סוֹדֵרִים. Exod. v. 14; Deut. xx. 5-9. Even in the time of Jacob, seals, upon which names are engraved in the east, were in use, Gen. xxxviii. 18; xli. 42; which is another probable testimony to the great antiquity of letters.

Letters, which had thus become known at the earliest period, were communicated by means of the Phenician merchants and colonies, and subsequently by Egyptian emigrants, through all the east and the west. A strong evidence of this is to be found in the different alphabets themselves, which betray by their resemblance a common origin. That the posterity of the Hebrew patriarchs preserved a knowledge of alphabetical writing during their abode in Egypt, where essentially the same alphabet was in use, is evident from the fact that the Hebrews while remaining there always had public genealogists. The law, also, was ordered to be inscribed on stones; a fact which implies a knowledge of alphabetical writing. The writing thus engraven upon stones is designated by its appropriate name, namely, חִזְיוֹן. Exod. xxxii. 16, 32. Not a few of the Hebrews might be unable to read and write, Judg. viii. 14; but those who were capable of writing wrote for others, when necessary. Such persons were commonly priests, who, as they do to this day in the east, bear an inkhorn in their girdle. Ezek. x. 2, 3, 11. In the inkhorn were the materials for writing, and a knife for sharpening the pen. Jer. xxxvi. 23. The rich and noble had scribes of their own, and readers also; whence there is more frequent mention made of hearing than of reading. 1 Kings iv. 3: 2 Kings xii. 10: Isa. xxix. 18: Jer. xxxvi. 4: Rom. ii. 13: James v. 11: Rev. i. 3. The scribes took youth under their care, who learned from them the art of writing. Some of the scribes seem to have held public schools for instruction; some of which, under the care of Samuel and other prophets, became in time quite illustrious, and were called the schools of the prophets. 1 Sam. xix. 16, etc.: 2 Kings ii. 3, 5; iv. 38; vi. 1. The disciples in these schools were not children or boys, but young men, who inhabited separate edifices, as is the case in the Persian academies. They were taught music and singing, and without doubt writing also, the Mosaic law, and poetry. They were denominated, in reference to their instructors, the sons of the prophets; teachers and prophets being sometimes called fathers. After the captivity there were schools for instruction either near the synagogues or in them.

The materials and instruments of writing were, 1. The leaves of trees. 2. The bark of trees, from which, in the process of time, a sort of paper was manufactured. 3. A table of wood, πίναξ, Deut. ix. 9: Isa. xxx. 8: Luke i. 63. In the east, these tables were not covered with wax as they were in the west; or, at any rate, very rarely so. 4. Linen was first used for the object in question at Rome. Linen books are mentioned by Livy. Cotton cloth also, which was used for the bandages of Egyptian mummies, and inscribed with hieroglyphics, was one of the materials for writing upon. 5. The paper made from the reed papyrus, which, as Pliny has shown, was used before the Trojan war. 6. The skins of various animals; but they were poorly prepared for the purpose, until some improved methods of manufacture were invented at Pergamus, during the reign of Eumenes, about B. C. 300. Hence the skins of animals, prepared for writing, are called in Latin pergamena, in English parchment, to this day, from the city Pergamus. They are sometimes denominated in Greek, μεμβράνα. 2 Tim. iv. 13. 7. Tables of lead, ἑρῆς, Job xix. 24. 8. Tables of brass, δέλτοι χαλκαί. Of all the materials, brass was considered among the most durable, and was employed for those inscriptions which were designed to last the longest. 1 Macc. viii. 22: xiv. 20-27. 9. Stones or rocks, upon which public laws, etc., were written. Sometimes the letters engraved were filled up with lime. Exod. xxiv. 12; xxxi. 18; xxxii. 19; xxxiv. 1: Deut. xxvii. 1-9: Josh. viii. 32: Job xix. 24. 10. Tiles. The inscriptions were made upon the tiles first, and afterward they were baked in the fire. They are yet to be found in the ruins of Babylon; others of later origin are to be found in many countries in the east. 11. The sand of the earth, in which the children in India to this day learn the art of writing, and in which Archimedes himself delineated his mathematical figures. John viii. 1-8. If in Ezekiel iii. 1, and in Revelation x. 9, we are informed that books were eaten, we must remember that the descriptions are figurative, and that they were eaten in vision; and consequently we are not at liberty to draw the conclusion from these passages, that any substance was used as materials for writing upon, which was at the same time used for food. The representations alluded to are symbolic, introduced to denote a communication or revelation from God.

As to the instruments used in writing, when it was necessary to write upon hard materials, as tables of stone and brass, the style was made of iron, and sometimes tipped with diamond. Jer. xvii. 1. The letters were formed upon tablets of wood, (when they were covered with wax,) with a style sharpened at one end, broad and smooth at the other; by means of which the letters, when badly written, might be rubbed out and the wax smoothed down. 2. Wax, however, was but rarely used for the purpose of covering writing-tables in warm regions. When this was not the case, the letters were painted on the wood with black tincture or ink. 3. On linen, cotton-cloth, paper, skins and parchment, the letters were painted with a very small brush, afterward with a reed, which was split. The orientals use this elegant instrument to the present day instead of a pen. Ink, called יִי, is spoken of in Numbers v. 23, as well known and common, Jer. xxxvi. 18, and was prepared in various ways, which are related by Pliny. The most simple, and consequently the most ancient method of preparation was a mixture of water with coals broken to pieces, or with soot, with an addition of gum. The ancients used other tinctures also; particularly, if we may credit Cicero and Persius, the ink extracted from the cuttle-fish, although their assertion is in opposition to Pliny. The Hebrews went so far as to write their sacred books in gold, as we may learn from Josephus compared with Pliny.

Hieroglyphics, that is, sacred sculptures or engravings, received that appellation, because it was once, and indeed till very lately, thought that they were used only to express, in a manner hidden from the vulgar, what was exclusively religious, and which it was thought proper to conceal from all but the learned. The fact, however, is, that the hieroglyphic was a kind of picture-writing, which passed through various modifications, and was applied alike to sacred and to civil purposes; to the emblazonment of the attributes of idols, the exploits of warriors, and the events of illustrious history. Rudiments of the same art have been found among almost all savages. Among the semi-civilized Mexicans history was pictorial; and in Ceylon and Continental India the same vehicle of instruction is made use of on the walls of their temples, to convey moral lessons, or to indicate the character and exploits of their deities. In Egypt, however, the art was carried into a more perfect system, and was more ostensibly set before the public eye on the massive and almost eternal monuments which cover the country. There, too, it ascends to ages of the world with which the Scriptures have made us familiar, and stands associated with royal dynasties, and vicissitudes of conquest, more intimately blended with that stream of civil history, along the margin of which European education conducts us. These mystic characters have acquired an adventitious interest also, from the circumstance that the key to them was for so many ages lost. This knowledge perished among that people themselves, the records of whose kings and conquests lay hid under the inexplicable symbol, or the fanciful representation of letters and sounds which were still familiar to the lips of those to whom the signs had become wholly unmeaning. Age after age they were gazed at by the curious; conjectures respecting their nature and use were offered by the learned, some absurd and some approaching the truth, but all failing to throw light upon a mystery, which at length was surrendered, by common consent, to the receptacle of lost and irrecoverable knowledge. Whether the hieroglyphics were symbols only, or words, or picturesque alphabetical characters, or expressed the popular tongue, or one known only to the priests, were questions answered at random by the prompt and dogmatic; and even the more modest and probable solutions of the cautious had so little collateral evidence to support them, that they led to no result. As to their intent, one thought that they involved the mysteries of magic; another, that they were a form of the Chinese language; a third, that they veiled the doctrines of the true patriarchal religion; a fourth, that they enveloped the dogmatic arcana of the Egyptian priesthood. The great point, however, to be determined was, whether the hieroglyphics were the signs of a language; that is, of the sounds of any language; and, if so, whether the language was now known, or knowable, from books still extant. Each of these points was of equal importance; for in vain would it have been ascertained that these signs represented the sounds of a tongue once spoken, if that tongue had perished from the earth. Clement of Alexandria, who lived about the end of the second century, asserted that the Egyptians had three modes of writing—the epistolographic, or common characters; the hieratic, or sacerdotal, employed chiefly by the priesthood in writing books; and the hieroglyphic, used on public monuments. The symbolical he again distributes into imitative, which represent the plain figure of an object, as a circle to express the sun, and a half circle the moon; tropical, which have recourse to analogy for the representation of the object; and enigmatical—as “a serpent, to signify the oblique course of the stars.” This writer could not so accurately have expressed the truth of the case, unless he had known much more than he has written; and we may presume that if he had been more liberal in his communications, the present age would not have had the honor of throwing open the gate to this branch of ancient learning. The notion which has generally prevailed, that by whatever rule the hieroglyphics were composed, they were invented by the Egyptian priests to conceal their wisdom from the vulgar, was combated by Bishop Warburton, with his usual acuteness. According to him, the first kind of hieroglyphics were mere pictures; because the most natural way of communicating our conceptions by marks or figures was to trace out the images of things. But the hieroglyphics invented by the Egyptians were an improvement on this rude and inconvenient essay toward writing; for they contrived to make them both pictures and characters. He proceeds to other observations, which have lost their interest in consequence of the recent discoveries; but he argues conclusively that hieroglyphics could not, in a vast number of cases, have been resorted to for purposes of secrecy, since they were employed to record openly and plainly their laws, history, and all kinds of civil matters. This, as a general view, has been proved to be correct; but still no key to the reading of these characters was found. The figures of deities might, in many instances, be deciphered by their attributes: other symbols were not difficult to explain, as they spoke a universal language. Thus two hands, one holding a bow, and another a shield, suggested a battle; an eye and a sceptre, a monarch of intelligence and vigilance; a ship and a pilot, the governor of a state if associated with a man, the ruler of the universe if associated with a deity. A lion was a natural emblem of strength and courage; a bullock, of agriculture; a horse, of liberty; a sphynx, of subtlety. But still those hieroglyphics were in the greatest number which appeared to represent letters; and many might prove, at the same time, both emblematic and alphabetical. Approaches to the truth of the case had been, indeed, made. Warburton, from an attentive perusal of what Clemens Alexandrinus had said on the subject, had, in fact, concluded, in a way highly creditable to his acuteness, that hieroglyphics were a real written language, applicable to the purposes of history and common life, as well as to those of religion; and that, among the different sorts of hieroglyphics, the Egyptians possessed those which were used phonetically, or alphabetically, as letters; but, till recently, the means of following out this ingenious and correct conjecture were wanting to the learned. The first effectual step was taken by M. Quatremere, who proved, in his work Sur la Langue et Littérature de l’Égypte, [Concerning the Language and Literature of Egypt,] that the Coptic, a language of easy attainment, at least to a considerable extent, was the language of the ancient Egyptians. The second favoring circumstance of modern times was, the publication of the researches made as to the monuments of Egypt by the literary men and artists who accompanied the French expedition to that country. Previous to this, the specimens which had been brought to Europe were few, and the impressions and the fac similes of them incorrect. Some, too, were imitations, and others spurious. In the works published in France after this expedition, the representations of Egyptian monuments were numerous; and the inscriptions were given with perfect exactness and fidelity. Still, however, those would have remained as unintelligible as the originals but for the discovery of the Rosetta stone, now among the Egyptian antiquities in the gallery of the British Museum. This stone was dug up by the French, near Rosetta, and contained an inscription in three sets of characters: one in hieroglyphics; a second in a sort of running hand, called enchorial, that is, in the common characters of the country; and a third in Greek. The last appearing, from the disposition of the whole, to be a translation of the enchorial inscription, as that was of the hieroglyphic, the importance of this stone was at once seen by the French savans; but, by the fortune of war, it was taken, with other valuables, by the British troops, and was sent to this country. The Antiquarian Society had it immediately engraved; and the fac similes, which were circulated through Europe, attracted great attention. Dr. Young has, however, the honor of being the discoverer of the nature and use of the hieroglyphical inscription. M. de Sacy, and more especially Mr. Akerblad, a Danish gentleman, made some progress in identifying the sense of several parts of the second inscription, or that in demotic or enchorial characters, but made no progress in the hieroglyphics; and it was left for British industry to convert to permanent profit a monument which had been a useless though a glorious monument of British valor. The inscription upon this celebrated stone proved to be a decree of the Egyptian priests, solemnly assembled in the temple, to record upon a monument, as a public expression of their gratitude, all the events of the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes: his liberality to the temples and to the gods; his success against his rebellious subjects; his clemency toward some of the traitors; his measures against the fatal consequences of excessive inundations of the Nile; and his munificence toward the college of the priests, by remitting the arrears of several years' payment of taxes. It was an important circumstance, that the whole concludes by ordering that this decree "shall be engraved on a hard stone in sacred characters, in common characters, and in Greek." By this it was ascertained that the second and third inscriptions were translations of the first; and that the second inscription was in the common character of the country. It was this that led Akerblad to the investigation of the enchorial text, in order to discover its alphabet; in which he partially succeeded. His labors were, however, for some time unnoticed; but in 1814, Dr. Young published, in the Archæologia, an improvement on the alphabet of Akerblad, and a translation of the Egyptian inscription. Difficulties of no ordinary kind, beside those arising from the mutilated state of the stone, presented themselves to all who had applied to make out even the second, or enchorial inscription.

"The method," says the Marquis Spineto, "pursued by our learned men in this herculean task of deciphering the Rosetta stone, deserves to be noticed: it may serve to give you a proper idea of the infinite labor to which they have been obliged to submit; a labor which at first seemed calculated to deter the most indefatigable scholar. Figure to yourself, for a moment, the fashion introduced of writing the English language with the omission of most of its vowels, and then suppose our alphabet to be entirely lost or forgotten, a new mode of writing introduced, letters totally different from those we use, and then conceive what our labor would be, if, after the lapse of fifteen hundred years, when the English language, by the operation of ages, and the intercourse with foreigners, was much altered from what it now is, we should be required, by the help of a Greek translation, to decipher a bill of parliament written in this old, forgotten, and persecuted alphabet, in every word of which we should find, and even this not always, the regular number of consonants, but most of the vowels left out. And yet this is precisely what our learned antiquarians have been obliged to do. The Egyptians, like most of the orientals, left out many of the vowels in writing. The enchorial, or demotic alphabet, which they used, has been laid aside since the second or third century of our era. From that time to this, that is, for nearly sixteen hundred years, the Coptic alphabet has been used; and yet in this Coptic language, and in these very enchorial or demotic characters, was engraved on the Rosetta stone the inscription which they have deciphered."

The steps of this interesting process are given by Dr. Young, in the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica. The substance is as follows: "As the demotic characters showed something like the shape of letters, it was shrewdly suspected that they might have been used as an alphabet. By comparing, therefore, its different parts with each other and with the Greek, it was observed that the two groups in the fourth and seventeenth lines of the Greek inscription, in which Alexander and Alexandria occur, corresponded with two other groups in the second and the tenth line of the demotic inscription. These two groups, therefore, were considered as representing these two names, and thus not less than seven characters, or letters, were ascertained. Again: it was observed that a small group of characters occurs very often in almost every line. At first it was supposed that this group was either a termination, or some very common particle; and after some words had been identified, it was found to mean the conjunction and. It was then observed that the next remarkable collection of characters was repeated twenty-nine or thirty times in the enchorial inscription, and nothing found to occur so often in the Greek, except the word king, which, with its compounds, is repeated about thirty-seven times. A fourth assemblage of characters was found fourteen times in the enchorial inscription, agreeing sufficiently well in frequency with the name of Ptolemy, which occurs eleven times in the Greek, and generally in passages corresponding to those of the enchorial text, in their relative situation; and, by a similar comparison, the name of Egypt was identified. Having thus obtained a sufficient number of common points of subdivision, the next step was to write the Greek text over the enchorial, in such a manner that the passages ascertained should coincide as nearly as possible; taking, however, a proper care to observe that the lines of the demotic or enchorial inscription are written from right to left, while those of the Greek run in a contrary direction, from left to right. At first sight this difficulty seemed very great; but it was conquered by proper attention and practice; because, after some trouble, the division of the several words and phrases plainly indicated the direction in which they were to be read. Thus it was obvious that the intermediate parts of each inscription stood then very near to the corresponding passages of the other."

By means of the process above mentioned, Akerblad, De Sacy, and Dr. Young, among whom a correspondence had been carried on, obtained a sort of alphabet from the enchorial characters, which might aid them in future researches. This result was published by Dr. Young in 1814. The examination of another stone at Menoup, containing an inscription in enchorial and in Greek characters, enabled Dr. Young to confirm the accuracy of former discoveries, and to add several new characters to the enchorial or demotic alphabet. Dr. Young next turned his attention to the hieroglyphics; and, though not with equal success, yet so as to demonstrate that they were phonetic or alphabetical, and to spell several proper names. The difficulty here, indeed, was how to begin; but his success opened a certain way to future progress; and it was upon Dr. Young's discovery that Champollion afterward engrafted his system, and was enabled to carry his researches into Egyptian antiquities and Egyptian hieroglyphics, to an extent which is now deeply engaging the attention of the literary world.

Two practical ends appear to have been answered already by the deciphering of the mystic monuments of Egypt. The first is, that the inscriptions which have been read by Champollion afford assistance in settling some questions of ancient chronology; the other is, that important collateral proof has been afforded of the historical accuracy of the Old Testament and the antiquity of its books. It is presumptive in favor of the genuineness and antiquity of the writings of Moses, that such proper Egyptian names as are found in no other ancient writings beside his own, such as On, and Rameses, and Potipherah, and Asenath, should now be read in hieroglyphic characters on monuments still standing in the same country. But the confirmatory evidence goes still further. In one inscription the names of two of the Pharaohs, Osorgon and Scheschonk, are exhibited. Of the characters which compose this legend some are phonetic, some figurative, and some symbolic. The whole reading in Coptic is, "Ouab an Amon-re soten annenoute Osorchon pri (or pre) ce or ci an ouab an Amon-re Souten Scheschonk-re Soten Nebto, (Amonmai Osorchon," etc. The meaning of which is, "The pure by Amon-re, king of the gods, Osorchon deceased, son of the pure, by Amon-re, king of the gods, Scheschonk deceased, son of king of the world, (beloved by Amon-re, Osorchon,) imparting life, like the sun, for ever." This Osorchon seems to have been the Zarah, or Zarach, the King of Ethiopia, recorded in the Second Book of Chronicles, who, with a host of a thousand thousand and three hundred chariots, came to make war against Asa, the grandson of Jeroboam, and was defeated at Mareshah. Although the Greek historians have never mentioned either the name or exploits of Osorchon, this fact is attested by a hieroglyphical manuscript, published by Denon. It is a funeral legend, loaded with figures, on and round which there are several hieroglyphical inscriptions. With respect to the other Pharaoh, Champollion, speaking of the temple of Karnac, says, "In this marvellous place I saw the portraits of most of the ancient Pharaohs, known by their great actions. They are real portraits, represented a hundred times on the basso-relievos of the outer and inner walls. Each of them has his peculiar physiognomy, different from that of his predecessors and successors. Thus, in colossal representations, the sculpture of which is lively, grand, and heroic, more perfect than can be believed in Europe, we see the Pharaoh Mandouei combating the nations hostile to Egypt, and returning triumphant to his country. Farther on, the campaigns of Rhameses Sesostris; elsewhere Sesonchis, or Shishak, dragging to the feet of the Theban Trinity, Ammon, Mouth, and Khous, the chiefs of thirty conquered nations, among which is found, written in letters at full length, the word Joudahamalek, that is, the kingdom of the Jews, or the kingdom of Judah. This is a commentary on the fourteenth chapter of the First Book of Kings, which relates the arrival of Shishak at Jerusalem, and his success there. Thus the identity between the Egyptian Sheschonk, the Sesonchis of Manetho, and the Sesac, or Schishchak of the Bible, is confirmed in the most satisfactory manner."

[XEROPHAGIA. This word, from ξηρὸς, dry, and φάγομαι, to eat, means the days on which nothing was eaten but bread and salt. At a later period, pulse, herbs, and fruit were added. This fast was not compulsory, except among the Montanists. The Essenes observed it, putting nothing into their bread but salt and hyssop.]

YEAR. The Hebrews had always years, of twelve months each. But at the beginning, and in the time of Moses, these were solar years, of twelve months; each having thirty days, except the twelfth, which had thirty-five. We see, by the reckoning that Moses gives us of the days of the deluge, Gen. vii., that the Hebrew year consisted of three hundred and sixty-five days. It is supposed that they had an intercalary month at the end of one hundred and twenty years; at which time the beginning of their year would be out of its place full thirty days. But it must be owned that no mention is made in Scripture of the thirteenth month, or of any intercalation. It is not improbable that Moses retained the order of the Egyptian year, since he himself came out of Egypt, was born in that country, had been instructed and brought up there, and since the people of Israel, whose chief he was, had been for a long time accustomed to this kind of year. But the Egyptian year was solar, and consisted of twelve months of thirty days each, and that for a very long time before. After the time of Alexander the Great, and the reign of the Grecians in Asia, the Jews reckoned by lunar months, chiefly in what related to religion, and the order of the festivals. St. John, in his Revelation, xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5, assigns but twelve hundred and sixty days to three years and a half, and consequently just thirty days to every month, and just three hundred and sixty days to every year. Maimonides tells us that the years of the Jews were solar, and their months lunar. Since the completing of the Talmud, they have made use of years that are purely lunar, having alternately a full month of thirty days, and then a defective month of twenty-nine days. And to accommodate this lunar year to the course of the sun, at the end of three years they intercalate a whole month after Adar; which intercalated month they call Ve-adar, or the second Adar.

The beginning of the year was various among different nations: the ancient Chaldeans, Babylonians, Medes, Persians, Armenians, and Syrians, began their year about the vernal equinox; and the Chinese in the east, and Latins and Romans in the west, originally followed the same usage. The Egyptians, and from them the Jews, began their civil year about the autumnal equinox. The Athenians, and Greeks in general, began theirs about the summer solstice; and the Chinese, and the Romans after Numa's correction, about the winter solstice. At which of these the primeval year, instituted at the creation, began, has been long contested among astronomers and chronologers. Philo, Eusebius, Cyril, Augustin, Abulfaragi, Kepler, Capellus, Simpson, Lange, and Jackson, contend for the vernal equinox; and Josephus, Scaliger, Petavius, Usher, Bedford, Kennedy, etc., for the autumnal. The weight of ancient authorities, and also of argument, seems to preponderate in favor of the former opinion. 1. All the ancient nations, except the Egyptians, began their civil year about the vernal equinox; but the deviation of the Egyptians from the general usage may easily be accounted for from a local circumstance peculiar to their country; namely, that the annual inundation of the Nile rises to its greatest height at the autumnal equinox. 2. Josephus, the only ancient authority of any weight on the other side, seems to be inconsistent with himself, in supposing that the deluge began in the second civil month, Dius, or Marheshvan, rather than in the second sacred month; because Moses, throughout the Pentateuch, uniformly adopts the sacred year, and fixes its first month by an indelible and unequivocal character, calling it Abib, as ushering in the season of green corn. And as Josephus calls the second month elsewhere Artemisius, or Iar, in conformity with Scripture, there is no reason why he should deviate from the same usage in the case of the deluge. 3. To the authority of Josephus we may oppose that of the great Jewish antiquary, Philo, in the generation before him, who thus accounts for the institution of the sacred year by Moses: "This month, Abib, being the seventh in number and order according to the sun's course, or civil year, reckoned from the autumnal equinox, is virtually the first, and is therefore called 'the first month' in the sacred books. And the reason, I think, is this: because the vernal equinox is the image and representative of the original epoch of the creation of the world. Thereby God notified the spring, in which all things bloom and blossom, to be an annual memorial of the world's creation. Wherefore this month is properly called the first in the law, as being the image of the first original month, stamped upon it, as it were, by that archetypal seal." 4. The first sacrifice on record seems to decide the question. The time of the sacrifice of Cain and Abel appears to have been spring; when Cain, who was a "tiller of the ground," brought the first-fruits of his tillage, or a sheaf of new corn; and Abel, who was "a feeder of sheep," "the firstlings of his flock," lambs; and this was done "at the end of days," or "at the end of the year;" which is the correct meaning of the phrase בְּעֵדֵי יָמִים, and not the indefinite expression, "in process of time," Gen. iv. 3. It is a remarkable proof of the accuracy of Moses, and a confirmation of this expression, that he expresses the end of the civil year, or "ingathering of the harvest," by different phrases, בְּצֵאת הַשָּׁנָה, "at the going out of the year," Exod. xxiii. 16; and תְּקִיפת הַשָּׁנָה, "at the revolution of the year," Exod. xxxiv. 22; as those phrases may more critically be rendered. But, in process of time, it was found that the primeval year of three hundred and sixty days was shorter than the tropical year; and the first discovery was, that it was deficient five entire days, which therefore it was necessary to intercalate, in order to keep up the correspondence of the civil year to the stated seasons of the principal festivals. How early this discovery and intercalation was made, is nowhere recorded. It might have been known and practiced before the deluge. The apocryphal book of Enoch, which probably was as old as the Septuagint translation of the Pentateuch, stated that "the archangel Ariel, president of the stars, discovered the nature of the month and of the year to Enoch, in the one hundred and sixty-fifth year of his age, and A. M. 1286." And it is remarkable that Enoch's age at his translation, three hundred and sixty-five years, expressed the number of entire days in a tropical year. This knowledge might have been handed down to Noah and his descendants; and that it was early communicated, indeed, to the primitive Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Chinese, we learn from ancient tradition.

This article would be rendered too prolix were we to notice the various inventions of eminent men in different ages to rectify the calendar by adjusting the difference between lunar and tropical years; which at length was effected by Gregory XIII., in 1583. This Gregorian, or reformed Julian year, was not adopted in England until A. D. 1751, when the deficiency from the time of the Council of Nice then amounting to eleven days, this number was struck out of the month of September, by act of parliament, and the third day was counted the fourteenth in that year of confusion. The next year, A. D. 1752, was the first of the new style. Russia is the only country in Europe which retains the old style.

The civil year of the Hebrews has always begun at autumn, at the month they now call Tishri, which answers to our September, and sometimes enters into October, according as the lunations happen. But their sacred years, by which the festivals, assemblies, and all other religious acts were regulated, begin in the spring, at the month Nisan, which answers to March, and sometimes takes up a part of April, according to the course of the moon. See MONTHS.

Nothing is more equivocal among the ancients than the term year. It always has been, and still is, a source of disputes among the learned, whether on account of its duration, its beginning, or its end. Some people heretofore made their year consist only of one month, others of four, others of six, others of ten, and others of twelve. Some have divided one of our years into two, and have made one year of winter, another of summer. The beginning of the year was fixed sometimes at autumn, sometimes at the spring, and sometimes at midwinter. Some people have used lunar months, others solar. Even the days have been differently divided; some people beginning them at evening, others at morning, others at noon, and others at midnight. With some the hours were equal, both in winter and summer; with others, they were unequal. They counted twelve hours to the day, and as many to the night. In summer the hours of the day were longer than those of the night; but, on the contrary, in winter the hours of the night were longer than those of the day.

While the Jews continued in the land of Canaan, the beginnings of their months and years were not settled by any astronomical rules or calculations, but by the phasis, or actual appearance, of the new moon. When they saw the new moon, they began the month. Persons were therefore appointed to watch on the tops of the mountain for the first appearance of the moon after the change. As soon as they saw it, they informed the sanhedrim, and public notice was given by lighting beacons throughout the land; though after they had been often deceived by the Samaritans, who kindled false fires, they used, say the Mishnical rabbins, to proclaim its appearance by sending messengers. Yet, as they had no months longer than thirty days, if they did not see the new moon the night following the thirtieth day, they concluded the appearance was obstructed by the clouds, and, without watching any longer, made the next day the first of the following month. But after the Jews became dispersed through all nations, where they had no opportunity of being informed of the first appearance of the new moon, as they formerly had, they were forced to make use of astronomical calculations and cycles for fixing the beginning of their months and years. The first cycle they made use of for this purpose was of eighty-four years. But that being discovered to be faulty, they came afterward into the use of Meto's cycle of nineteen years, which was established by the authority of Rabbi Hillel Hannasi, or prince of the sanhedrim, about A. D. 360. This they still use, and say it is to be observed till the coming of the Messiah. In the compass of this cycle there are twelve common years, consisting of twelve months, and seven intercalary years, consisting of thirteen months. We find the Jews and their ancestors computing their years from different eras, in different parts of the Old Testament; as, from the birth of the patriarchs—for instance, of Noah, Gen. vii. 11; viii. 13; afterward from their exit out of Egypt, Num. xxxiii. 38: 1 Kings vi. 1; then from the building of Solomon's temple, 2 Chron. viii. 1; and from the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel. In later times the Babylonish captivity furnished them with a new epocha, from whence they computed their years. Ezek. xxxiii. 21; xl. 1. But since the times of the Talmudical rabbins, they have constantly used the era of the creation.

There is not a more prolific source of confusion and embarrassment in ancient chronology, than the substitution of the cardinal numbers, one, two, three, for the ordinals, first, second, third, etc., which frequently occurs in the sacred and profane historians. Thus Noah was six hundred years old when the deluge began, Gen. vii. 6; and presently after, in his six hundredth year; confounding complete and current years. And the dispute whether A. D. 1800, or A. D. 1801, was the first of the nineteenth century, should be decided in favor of the latter, the former being, in reality, the last of the eighteenth century; which is usually, but improperly, called the year one thousand eight hundred, complete; whereas it is really the one thousandth eight hundredth;

as in Latin we say, Anno Domini millesimo octingentesimo. There is also another and a prevailing error, arising from mistranslation of the current phrases, μετ' ἡμέρας ὀκτώ, μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας, etc., usually rendered, "after eight days," "after three days," etc.; but which ought to be rendered "eight days after," "three days after," as in other places, μετὰ τινος ἡμέρας, μετ' οὐ πολλὰς ἡμέρας, which are correctly rendered "some days after," "not many days after," in our English Bible, Acts xv. 36: Luke xv. 13, the extreme days being included. Such phrases seem to be elliptical, and the ellipsis is supplied, Luke ix. 28, speaking of our Lord's transfiguration, μετὰ τοῦς λόγους τούτους, ὥστε ἡμέραι ὀκτώ: "After these sayings, about eight days;" or rather about the eighth day, counted inclusively; for in the parallel passages, Matt. xvii. 1, Mark ix. 2, there are only "six days," counted exclusively, or omitting the extremes. Thus, circumcision is prescribed, Gen. xvii. 11, when the child is "eight days old;" but in Lev. xii. 3, "on the eighth day." And Jesus accordingly was circumcised, ὅτε ἐπλήσθησαν ἡμέραι ὀκτώ, "when eight days were accomplished," Luke ii. 21; whereas John the Baptist, τῇ ὀγδόῃ ἡμέρᾳ, "on the eighth day." The last, which was the constant usage, explains the meaning of the former. This critically reconciles our Lord's resurrection, μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας, "three days after," according to Matt. xxvii. 63: Mark viii. 31, with his resurrection, τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ, "on the third day," according to Matt. xvi. 21: Luke ix. 22; and according to fact; for our Lord was crucified on Good Friday, about the third hour; and he arose before sunrise, πρῶτῃ, "early," on Sunday, so that the interval, though extending through three calendar days current, did not in reality amount to two entire days, or forty-eight hours. This phraseology is frequent among the most correct classic writers. Some learned commentators, Beza, Grotius, Campbell, Newcome, render such phrases, "within eight days," "within three days;" which certainly conveys the meaning, but not the literal translation, of the preposition μετὰ, "after." In memory of the primeval week of creation, revived among the Jews after their departure from Egypt, their principal festivals, the passover, pentecost, and tabernacles, lasted a week each. They had weeks of seven years a-piece, at the term of which was the sabbatical year; as also weeks of seven times seven years, that were terminated by the year of jubilee; and finally, weeks of seven days. And it is remarkable, that from the earliest times sacrifices were offered by sevens. Thus, in the patriarch Job's days, "seven bullocks and seven rams were offered up for a burnt-offering" of atonement, by the Divine command. Job xlii. 8. The Chaldean diviner, Balaam, built seven altars, and prepared seven bullocks and seven rams. Num. xxiii. 1. And the Cumæan sibyl, who came from Chaldaea, or Babylonia, gives the same directions to Æneas that Balaam did to Balak:

*Nunc grege de intacto septem mactare juvencos
Præstitit, totidem lectas, de more, bidentes.*

"Seven bullocks, yet unyoked, for Phœbus choose,
And for Diana seven unspotted ewes."—DRYDEN.

And when the ark was brought home by David, the Levites offered seven bullocks and seven rams. 1 Chron. xv. 26. And hence we may account for the peculiar sanctity of the seventh day among the older heathen writers, even after the institution of the Sabbath fell into disuse, and was lost among them.

THE FALLOW or SABBATIC YEAR. Agricultural labor among the Jews ceased every seventh year. Nothing was sown, and nothing reaped; the vines and the olives were not pruned; there was no vintage and no gathering of fruits, even of what grew wild; but whatever spontaneous productions there were, were left to the poor, the traveller, and the wild beast. Lev. xxv. 1-7: Deut. xv. 1-10. The object of this regulation seems to have been, among others, to let the ground recover its strength, and to teach the Hebrews to be provident of their income and to look out for the future. It is true that extraordinary fruitfulness was promised on the sixth year, but in such a way as not to exclude care and foresight. Lev. xxv. 20-24. We are not to suppose, however, that the Hebrews spent the seventh year in absolute idleness: they could fish, hunt, take care of their bees and flocks, repair their buildings and furniture, manufacture cloths of wool, linen, and of the hair of goats and camels, and carry on commerce. Finally, they were obliged to remain longer in the tabernacle or temple this year, during which the whole Mosaic law was read, in order to be instructed in religious and moral duties, and the history of their nation, and the wonderful works and blessings of God. Deut. xxxi. 10-13. This seventh year's rest, as Moses predicted, Lev. xxvi. 34, 35, was for a long time neglected, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21: after the captivity it was more scrupulously observed.

As a period of seven days was every week completed by the Sabbath, so was a period of seven years completed by the sabbatic year. It seems to have been the design of this institution to afford a longer opportunity than would otherwise have been enjoyed for impressing on the memory the great truth that God the Creator is alone to be worshipped. The commencement of this year was on the first day of the seventh month, Tishri, [which answers to a part of September and] October. During the continuance of the feast of tabernacles this year, the law was to be publicly read for eight days together, either in the tabernacle or temple. Deut. xxxi. 10-13. Debts, on account of there being no income from the soil, were not collected, Deut. xv. 1, 2; they were not, however, cancelled, as was imagined by the Talmudists; for we find in Deut. xv. 9, that the Hebrews are admonished not to deny money to the poor on account of the approach of the sabbatical year, during which it could not be exacted; but nothing further than this can be deduced from that passage. Nor were servants manumitted on this year, but on the seventh year of their service. Exod. xxi. 2: Deut. xv. 12: Jer. xxxiv. 14.

THE YEAR OF JUBILEE followed seven sabbatic years; it was on the fiftieth year. Lev. xxv. 8-11. To this statement agree the Jews generally, their rabbins, and the Caraites; and say further, that the argument of those who maintain that it was on the forty-ninth, for the reason that the omission to till the ground for two years in succession, namely, the forty-ninth and fiftieth, would produce a famine, is not to be attended to. It is not to be attended to, simply because these years of rest being known long beforehand, the people would of course lay up provision for them. It may be remarked further in reference to this point, that certain trees produced their fruits spontaneously, particularly the fig and sycamore, which yield half the year round, and that those fruits could be preserved for some months; which explains at once how a considerable number of the people might have obtained no inconsiderable portion of their support. The return of the year of jubilee was announced on the tenth day of the seventh month, or Tishri, being the day of propitiation or atonement, by the sound of trumpet. Lev. xxv. 8-13; xxvii. 24: Num. xxxvi. 4: Isa. lxi. 1, 2. Beside the regulations which obtained on the sabbatic year, there were others which concerned the year of jubilee exclusively: 1. All the servants of Hebrew origin, on the year of jubilee obtained their freedom. Lev. xxv. 39-46: Jer. xxxiv. 7, etc. 2. All the fields throughout the country, and the houses in the cities and villages of the Levites and priests, which had been sold on the preceding years, were returned on the year of jubilee to the sellers, with the exception of those which had been consecrated to God, and had not been redeemed before the return of the said year. Lev. xxv. 10, 13-17, 24-28; xxvii. 16-21. 3. Debtors, for the most part, pledged or mortgaged their lands to the creditor, and left it to his use till the time of payment, so that it was in effect sold to the creditor, and was, accordingly, restored to the debtor on the year of jubilee. In other words, the debts for which land was pledged were cancelled; the same as those of persons who had recovered their freedom after having been sold into slavery on account of not being able to pay. Hence it usually happened in the later periods of Jewish history, as we learn from Josephus, that, at the return of jubilee, there was a general cancelling of debts.

[YEZIDES. Followers of Yezid, an Arabian prince, who killed two sons of Ali, Mohammed's father-in-law, for which reason they are detested by the Mussulmans, who are in return cordially hated by them. They profess to believe both the Koran and the Bible; but they read neither. They love wine, which they call "the blood of Jesus Christ." They wish to be on good terms with the devil, whom they call "the great chief." They are nomadic in their habits, and have no places of worship. They live chiefly in the mountains of Sangara.]

[YOKE. יֶזֶק, עֶזֶק, Zuyók. A piece of wood hollowed or curved at each end, and fitted with bows for the necks of oxen or other animals, to join two together for the purpose of drawing. Num. xix. 2. It is used figuratively for servitude, Gen. xxvii. 40: Lev. xxvi. 13: 1 Kings xii. 4, 9, 10, 11, 14: Isa. x. 27: Lam. iii. 27: Matt. xi. 29, 30: Acts xv. 10: Gal. v. 1: 1 Tim. vi. 1. מֶזְמָר is considered the cross-bar of a yoke, which goes over the neck, Jer. xxviii. 10, 12, 13: the plural is rendered bands in Lev. xxvi. 13. זֶמֶר, Zeyók, rendered yoke, 1 Sam. xi. 7: 1 Kings

xix. 19: Luke xiv. 19, mean a pair: צמד, 1 Sam. xiv. 14: Isa. v. 10, means an acre of land, or as much as a pair of oxen can plough in a day. Thus an acre is called in Latin jugerum, from jugum, a yoke. To be unequally yoked, 2 Cor. vi. 14, is to be unfitly joined, particularly in marriage, as Christians with heathens. The apostle seems to allude to Lev. xix. 19, where the LXX. use a form of the word which he employs.]

[YOKE-FELLOW. Σόζυγος. A companion in labor—a colleague. Phil. iv. 3. Some think the presiding elder at Philippi was meant.]

[ZABAD. The name of four persons mentioned, 1 Chron. ii. 36; vii. 21: 2 Chron. xxiv. 26; called Jozachar, 2 Kings xii. 21: Ezra x. 27.]

[ZABATHAITES. Followers of Zabathai, or Sabatai Tzevi. Some of them are said to have been found among the Mussulmans in Salonichi, secretly practicing their Jewish rites, in the present century. See MESSIAH.]

[ZABEANS. An ancient sect who held John the Baptist to be the Messiah. They are identified with the Disciples of John, spoken of in the Clementine Recognitions. Some think the Hemero-Baptists are the remains of this sect. See MENDEANS.]

ZABII, or ZABÆANS, or ZABIANS, or SABIANS. The Sabians mentioned in Scripture were evidently a nation, or perhaps a wandering horde, such as fell upon Job's cattle, Job i. 15; men of stature, Isa. xlv. 14; a people afar off, Joel iii. 8. But we speak here of the Zabians as a sect, probably the first corrupters of the patriarchal religion; and so called, as is believed, from tsabim, the "hosts," that is, of heaven: namely, the sun, moon, and stars, to whom they rendered worship; first immediately, and afterward through the medium of images: this particularly distinguished them from the magi, whose idolatry was confined to the solar orb, and its earthly representative, the fire. If the above derivation be right, the Zabians were originally Chaldeans, though afterward the same sect arose in Arabia. Their study of the heavenly bodies led them, not only to astronomy, but to astrology, its degenerate daughter, which was for many ages the favorite pursuit of the oriental nations.

The following account is abridged from Dr. Townley's "Essays:"—The Zabii, or Zabians, were a sect of idolaters who flourished in the early ages of the world, considerable in their numbers, and extensive in their influence. The denomination of Zabii given to these idolaters appears to have been derived from the Hebrew צבא, a host; with reference to the השמים, heavens, which they worshipped; though others have derived it from the Arabic tsaba, "to apostatize," "to turn from one religion to another;" or from צבאים, the Arabs Tsabin, "Chaldeans," or "inhabitants of the east." Lactantius considers Ham, the son of Noah, as the first seceder from the true religion after the flood; and supposes Egypt, which was peopled by his descendants, to have been the country in which Zabaism, or the worship of the stars, first prevailed. That the worship of the heavenly bodies prevailed in the east at a very early period, is certain from the words of Job, who thus exculpates himself from the charge of idolatry: "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand, this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge; for I should have denied the God that is above." Job xxxi. 26-28. It would appear that the idolatrous opinions of the Zabii originated with the posterity of Ham, at a very early period after the flood, in Egypt or Chaldea; but spread so rapidly and extensively, that in a very short time nearly the whole of the descendants of Noah were infected with their pestiferous sentiments and practices. Maimonides says, "This people," that is, the Zabii, "had filled the whole world." Their first and principal adoration was directed to the host of heaven, or the stars. They were ignicolæ, or "worshippers of fire." The city of Ur, in Chaldea, seems to have had its name from the inhabitants being devoted to the worship of fire. They dedicated images to the sun and the other celestial orbs, supposing that, by a formal consecration of them to those luminaries, a divine virtue was infused into them, by which they acquired the faculty of understanding, and the power of conferring prophecy and other gifts upon their worshippers. These images were formed of various metals, according to the particular star to which any of them was dedicated. They also regarded certain trees as being appropriated to particular stars, and, when idolatrously dedicated, as being possessed of very singular virtues. From these opinions sprang the adoption of astrology by them, in all its various forms. They maintained the doctrine of the eternity of the world. "All the Zabii," says Maimonides, "believe in the eternity of the world; for, according to them, the heavens are God." Holding the eternity of the world, they easily became Pre-Adamites, affirming that Adam was not the first man. They also fabled concerning him, that he was the apostle of the moon, and the author of several works on husbandry. Of Noah, they taught that he was a husbandman, and was imprisoned for dissenting from their opinions. They add, that Seth was another of those who forsook the worship of the moon. They held agriculture in the highest estimation, regarding it as intimately connected with the worship of the heavenly bodies. On this account, it was deemed criminal, by the major part of them, to slay or feed upon cattle. Goats were also reputed to be sacred animals, because the demons whom they worshipped were said to appear in the woods and deserts in the forms of goats or of satyrs. Of their superstitious practices, some were dangerous, as the sacrifices of lions, tigers, and other wild beasts. Certain of their rites were cruel, as the passing of their children through the fire, and branding themselves also with fire. Some of their practices were loathsome and disgusting; such as eating blood, believing it to be the food of demons, etc. Others were frivolous and tedious; as offering bats and mice to the sun, various and frequent ablutions, lustrations, etc. Some of them were obscene and beastly, as the rites practiced on engrafting a tree, or to obtain

RAM. Many of the rites were magical. These Maimonides divides into three kinds: "The first is that which respects plants, animals, and metals. The second consists in the limitation and determination of the times in which certain works ought to be performed. The third consists in human gestures and actions, as leaping, clapping the hands, shouting, laughing, lying down, or stretching at full length upon the ground, burning particular things, raising a smoke, and, lastly, repeating certain-intelligible or unintelligible words. Some things cannot be completed without the use of all these rites." It is generally acknowledged that some traces of Zabianism are still to be found both among the Hindoos and Chinese in the east, and the Mexicans and other nations in the south. The Guebres, or Parsees, who inhabit Persia, and are scattered through various parts of Hindostan, are the acknowledged worshippers of fire, or the supreme Deity under that symbol. "That the Persians," says Hyde, "were formerly Sabians or Zabii, is rendered probable by Ibn Phacreddin Angjou, a Persian, who, in his book 'Pharhangh Gjhanghiri,' treating of the Persians descended from Shem, says in the preface, 'Their religion, at that time, was Zabianism; but at length they became magi, and built fire-temples.' And the author of the book 'Mu'gizat Parsi' adopts the same opinion: 'In ancient times, the Persians were of the Zabian religion, worshipping the stars, until the time of Gushtasp, son of Lohrasp.' For then Zoroaster reformed their religion." The modern Sabians, who inhabit the country round about Mount Libanus, believe the unity of God, but pay an adoration to the stars, or the angels and intelligences which they suppose reside in them, and govern the world under the supreme Deity. They are obliged to pray three times a day, and they fast three times a year. They offer many sacrifices, but eat no part of them; and abstain from beans, garlic, and some other pulse and vegetables. They greatly respect the temple of Mecca and the pyramids of Egypt, fancying these last to be the sepulchres of Seth, and of Enoch and Sabi, his two sons, whom they look on as the first propagators of their religion. At these structures, they sacrifice a cock and a black calf, and offer up incense. Their principal pilgrimage, however, is to Haran, the supposed birthplace of Abraham. Such is the account of this sect given by Sale, D'Herbelot, and Hyde.

[ZABUD. Son of Nathan. He is called "the king's friend," 1 Kings iv. 5, having been, it is thought, brought up with Solomon, who was probably educated by Nathan.]

ZACCHEUS, chief of the publicans; that is, farmer-general of the revenues. Luke xix. 1, etc. This is all that is known concerning this person. See PUBLICANS and SYCAMORE.

[ZACHARIAH, ZACHARIAS. See ZECHARIAH.]

ZADOK, son of Ahitub, high-priest of the Jews, of the race of Eleazar. At the death of Ahimelech, or Abiathar, he came to the pontificate, A. M. 2944. For some time there were two high-priests in Israel. 2 Sam. viii. 17; xv. 24, etc.; xix. 11, 12: 1 Kings i. 8, etc. After the death of David, 1 Kings ii. 35, Solomon excluded Abiathar from the high-priesthood, because he espoused the party of Adonijah, and made Zadok high-priest alone. [Others of this name are mentioned, 2 Kings xv. 33: 1 Chronicles vi. 12; xii. 28: Nehemiah iii. 4, 29; x. 21; xiii. 13.]

[ZALMON. An Ahoite: one of David's heroes. 2 Sam. xxiii. 28.]

[ZALMON, ZALMUN. A mountain near Shechem. Judg. ix. 48: Ps. lxxviii. 14.]

[ZALMONAH. A station of the Israelites, between Mount Hor and Punon. Num. xxxiii. 41, 42. As the root tsalem means an image, some think it derived its name from the brazen image which, they conjecture, was erected here.]

[ZALMUNNA. A Midianite chief. Judg. viii. 5.]

ZAMZUMMIM, or ZUZIM, a gigantic race of people, who, together with the Rephaim and Emim, men of like stature, occupied, in the time of Abraham, the country east of Jordan and the Dead Sea, where they were routed by Chedorlaomer, and from which they were afterward expelled by the Ammonites. Deut. ii. 20, 21. These, together with the Anakim, another family of giants, were all evidently of a race foreign to the original inhabitants of the countries where they were found; they were probably tribes of invading Cushites. The Vulgate and the Septuagint say they were conquered with the Rephaim in Ashteroth-Karnaim. The Chaldee interpreters have taken Zuzim in the sense of an appellative for stout and valiant men; and the Septuagint have rendered the word Zuzim, ἰσχυρά, robust nations. We meet with the word Zuzim only in Gen. xiv. 5.

[ZANOAH. A town in the plain of Judah, identified by Robinson with Zanû'a, which "lies on the low slope of a hill not far east of 'Ain Shems," or Beth-shemesh. See ZORAH.—There was also a Zanoah in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 56.]

[ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH. A name given by Pharaoh to Joseph, meaning, according to some, sustainer of the age: Jerome renders salvator mundi, saviour of the world. Gen. xli. 45. See Clarke and Boothroyd, in loc.]

[ZARAH, ZERAH. Grandson of Esau. Gen. xxxvi. 13.—Son of Judah and Tamar. Gen. xxxviii. 30: 1 Chron. ii. 4, 6: Matt. i. 3.—Son of Simeon, Num. xxvi. 13; called Zohar, Gen. xli. 10.—A Cushite warrior, who invaded Judah in the time of Asa. 2 Chron. xiv. 9–15.]

[ZAREPHATH, SAREPTA. 1 Kings xvii. 9, 10: Obad. 20: Luke iv. 26. A city of Sidon, situated, according to Josephus and Pliny, between Tyre and Sidon. Jerome says it was visited by Paula. Its wine is highly celebrated in Latin poems of the subsequent centuries. At the end of the sixth century Antoninus Martyr describes it as a small Christian city. The crusaders made it the seat of a Latin bishop, and built near the port a small chapel over the reputed spot where Elijah dwelt. Phocas, A. D. 1185, speaks of a fortress on the shore. A century later Brocardus says the place had scarcely eight houses, though many ruins indicated its ancient splendor. A mosque appears to have superseded the chapel: it is probably found in a wely, or tomb, called el-Khudr, the Arab name of St. George. Surafend, as it is now called, is at some distance from the old ruins. It is described by Robinson as a large village with two or three welys, sprung up probably since the Crusades.]

[ZARETAN. A town on the Jordan, not far from Beth-shan, belonging to Manasseh. Josh. iii. 16. It is identified with Zerether, Judg. vii. 22; Zartanah, Zarthan, Zereda, 1 Kings iv. 12; vii. 46; xi. 26; Zeredathah, 2 Chron. iv. 17.]

ZEAL. The original word, in its primary signification, means heat; such as the heat of boiling water. When it is figuratively applied to the mind, it means any warm emotion or affection. Sometimes it is taken for envy: so we render it, Acts v. 17, where we read, "The high-priest, and all that were with him, were filled with envy," ἐκλήσθησαν ζήλου: although it might as well be rendered, "were filled with zeal." Sometimes it is taken for anger and indignation; sometimes, for vehement desire. And when any of our passions are strongly moved on a religious account, whether for any thing good, or against any thing which we conceive to be evil, this we term religious zeal. But it is not all that is called religious zeal which is worthy of that name. It is not properly religious or Christian zeal, if it be not joined with charity. A fine writer (Bishop Sprat) carries the matter farther still. "It has been affirmed," says he, "no zeal is right which is not charitable, but is mostly so. Charity, or love, is not only one ingredient, but the chief ingredient, in its composition." May we not go farther still? May we not say that true zeal is not mostly charitable, but wholly so? that is, if we take charity, in St. Paul's sense, for love—the love of God and our neighbor. For it is a certain truth, although little understood in the world, that Christian zeal is all love. It is nothing else. The love of God and man fills up its whole nature. Yet it is not every degree of that love to which this appellation is given. There may be some love, a small degree of it, where there is no zeal. But it is, properly, love in a higher degree. It is fervent love. True Christian zeal is no other than the flame of love. This is the nature, the inmost essence of it. Phinehas is commended for having expressed much zeal against those wicked persons that violated the law of the Lord, Num. xxv. 11, 13; and in Psalm lxxix. 9, the Psalmist says, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up;" my earnest desire to have all things duly ordered about thy worship, and my just displeasure and indignation at all abuses in it, have wasted my natural moisture and vital spirits.

[ZEALOTS. A sect of Jews who held it unlawful to pay tribute to the Romans, considering it a renunciation of the theocracy. They defended themselves by force of arms, and became notorious for deeds of violence. They are also called Sicarii, Assassins: a name, says Josephus, derived from sica, a crooked knife, with which they secretly stabbed the objects of their malice. See Acts xxi. 38.]

[ZEBAH. A Midianite chief. Judg. viii. 5.]

[ZEBEDEE. Father of James and John. Mark i. 19.]

ZEBOIM, one of the four cities of the Pentapolis, consumed by fire from heaven. Gen. xiv. 2; xix. 24. Eusebius and St. Jerome speak of Zeboim as of a city remaining in their time, upon the western shores of the Dead Sea. Consequently, after the time of Lot this city must have been rebuilt near the place where it had stood before. Mention is made of the valley of Zeboim, 1 Sam. xiii. 18, and of a city of the same name in the tribe of Benjamin. Neh. xi. 34.

[ZEBUL. A governor of Shechem. Judg. ix. 28-41.]

ZEKULUN, the sixth son of Jacob and Leah. Gen. xxx. 20. He was born in Mesopotamia, about A. M. 2256. His sons were Sered, Elon, and Jahleel. Gen. xli. 14. Moses acquaints us with no particulars of his life; but Jacob, in his last blessing, said of Zebulun, "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea; and he shall be for a haven of ships; and his border shall be unto Zidon." Gen. xlix. 13. His portion extended along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, one end of it bordering on this sea, and the other on the Sea of Tiberias. Josh. xix. 10, etc. In the last words of Moses, he joins Zebulun and Issachar together, saying, "Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out, and Issachar in thy tents. They shall call the people unto the mountain, there shall they offer sacrifices of righteousness. For they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand," Deut. xxxiii. 18; meaning, that these two tribes being at the greatest distance north, should come together to the temple at Jerusalem, to the holy mountain, and should bring with them such of the other tribes as dwelt in their way; and that being situated on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, they should apply themselves to trade and navigation, and to the melting of metals and glass, denoted by those words, "treasures hid in the sand." The river Belus, whose sand was very fit for making glass, was in this tribe. When the tribe of Zebulun left Egypt, it had for its chief, Eliab the son of Elon, and comprehended fifty-seven thousand four hundred men able to bear arms. Num. i. 9-30. In another review, thirty-nine years afterward, this tribe amounted to sixty thousand five hundred men of age to bear arms. Num. xxvi. 26, 27. The tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali distinguished themselves in the war of Barak and Deborah against Sisera, the general of the armies of Jabin. Judges iv. 5, 6, 10; v. 14, 18. It is thought these tribes were the first carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates, by Pul and Tiglath-pileser, Kings of Assyria. 1 Chron. v. 26. They had also the advantage of hearing and seeing Jesus Christ in their country oftener and longer than any other of the twelve tribes. Isa. ix. 1; Matt. iv. 13, 15.

ZECHARIAH, King of Israel, 2 Kings xiv. 29. He succeeded his father, Jeroboam II., A. M. 3220. He reigned but six months, and was murdered. [2 Kings xv. 8-11.]

ZECHARIAH, son of Jehoiada, high-priest of the Jews; probably the same as Azariah. 1 Chron. vi. 10, 11. He was put to death by the order of Joash, A. M. 3164. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20-22. Some think this is the Zacharias mentioned Matt. xxiii. 35.

ZECHARIAH, the eleventh of the twelve lesser prophets, was the son of Barachiah, and the grandson of Iddo. He was born during the captivity, and came to Jerusalem when the Jews were permitted by Cyrus to return to their own country. He began to prophesy two months later than Haggai, and continued to exercise his office about two years. Like his contemporary Haggai, Zechariah begins with exhorting the Jews to proceed in the rebuilding of the temple; he promises them the aid and protection of God, and assures them of the speedy increase and prosperity of Jerusalem; he then emblematically describes the four great empires, and foretells the glory of the Christian Church when Jews and Gentiles shall be united under their great High-Priest and Governor, Jesus Christ, of whom Joshua the high-priest, and Zerubbabel the governor, were types; he predicts many particulars relative to our Saviour and his kingdom, and to the future condition of the Jews. Many moral instructions and admonitions are interspersed throughout the work. Several learned men have been of opinion that the last six chapters were not written by Zechariah; but whoever wrote them, their inspired authority is established by their being quoted in three of the Gospels. Matt. xvi. 31: Mark xiv. 27: John xix. 37. The style of Zechariah is so remarkably similar to that of Jeremiah, that the Jews were accustomed to observe, that the spirit of Jeremiah had passed into him. By far the greater part of this book is prosaic; but toward the conclusion there are some poetical passages which are highly ornamented. The diction is in general perspicuous, and the transitions to the different subjects are easily discerned.

[Others of this name are mentioned, 1 Chron. v. 7; ix. 21; xv. 18, 24; xvi. 5; xxvi. 11; xxvii. 21: 2 Chron. xvii. 7; xx. 14; xxi. 2; xxvi. 5; xxix. 1, 18; xxxiv. 12; xxxv. 8: Ezra viii. 3, 11; x. 23: Neh. viii. 4; xi. 4, 5; xii. 35, 41: Isa. viii. 2: Luke i.]

[ZEDED.] A place on the northern extremity of the land of Israel. Num. xxxiv. 8: Ezek. xlvi. 15. Robinson identifies it with the large village of Sudud, which lies in the desert east of the road from Damascus to Hums.]

ZEDEKIAH, or MATTANIAH, was the last king of Judah before the captivity of Babylon. He was the son of Josiah, and uncle to Jehoiachin his predecessor. 2 Kings xxiv. 17, 19. When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, he carried Jehoiachin to Babylon, with his wives, children, officers, and the best artificers in Judea, and put in his place his uncle Mattaniah, whose name he changed into Zedekiah, and made him promise, with an oath, that he would continue in fidelity to him, A. M. 3405. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13: Ezek. xvii. 12, 14, 18. He was twenty-one years old when he began to reign at Jerusalem, and he reigned there eleven years. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, committing the same crimes as Jehoiakim, 2 Kings xxiv. 18-20: 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11-13; and regarded not the menaces of the prophet Jeremiah from the Lord, but hardened his heart. The princes of the people, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem; imitated his impiety, and abandoned themselves to all the abominations of the Gentiles. In the first year of his reign Zedekiah sent to Babylon Elasah, the son of Shaphan, and Gemariah, the son of Hilkiah, probably to carry his tribute to Nebuchadnezzar. By these messengers Jeremiah sent a letter to the captives at Babylon. Jer. xxix. 1-28. Four years afterward, either Zedekiah went thither himself, or at least he sent thither; for the Hebrew text may admit either of these interpretations. Jer. li. 59: Baruch i. 1: Jer. xxxii. 12. The chief design of this deputation was to entreat Nebuchadnezzar to return the sacred vessels of the temple. Baruch i. 8. In the ninth year of his reign he revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kings xxv. It was a sabbatical year, in which the people should set their slaves at liberty, according to the law, Exod. xxi. 2: Deut. xv. 1, 2, 12: Jer. xxxiv. 8-10. Then King Nebuchadnezzar marched his army against Zedekiah, and took all the fortified places of his kingdom, except Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem. He sat down before the last-mentioned city on the tenth day of the tenth month of the holy year, which answers to our January. Some time afterward, Pharaoh-Hophrah, King of Egypt, marched to assist Zedekiah. Jer. xxxvii. 3-5, 10. Nebuchadnezzar left Jerusalem and went to meet him, defeated him, and obliged him to return into Egypt, after which he resumed the siege of Jerusalem. In the meanwhile, the people of Jerusalem, as if freed from the fear of Nebuchadnezzar, retook the slaves whom they had set at liberty, which drew upon them great reproaches and threatenings from Jeremiah, xxxiv. 11, 22. During the siege Zedekiah often consulted Jeremiah, who advised him to surrender, and pronounced the greatest woes against him if he should persist in his rebellion. Jer. xxxvii. 3, 10; xxi. But this unfortunate prince had neither patience to hear, nor resolution to follow, good counsels. In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, on the ninth day of the fourth month, (July,) Jerusalem was taken. 2 Kings xxv. 2-4: Jer. xxxix. 2, 3; lli. 5-7. Zedekiah and his people endeavored to escape by favor of the night; but the Chaldean troops pursuing them, they were overtaken in the plains of Jericho. He was seized and carried to Nebuchadnezzar, then at Riblah, a city of Syria. The King of Chaldea, reproaching him with his perfidy, caused all his children to be slain before his face, and his eyes to be put out; then, loading him with chains of brass, he ordered him to be sent to Babylon. 2 Kings xxv. 4-7: Jer. xxxix. 4-7; lli. 4-11. Thus were accomplished two prophecies which seemed contradictory: one of Jeremiah, who said that Zedekiah should see Nebuchadnezzar with his eyes, Jer. xxxii. 4, 5; xxxiv. 3; and the other of Ezekiel, xii. 13, which intimated that he should not see Babylon, though he should die there. The year of his death is not known. Jeremiah had assured him that he should die in peace; that his body should be burned, as those of the kings of Judah usually were; and that they should mourn for him, saying, "Ah, lord!" Jer. xxxiv. 4, 5.

[ZEDEKIAH.] A false prophet. 1 Kings xxii. 11, 24.]

[ZEEB. See OREB.]

[ZELAH. A town in Benjamin, where Kish, Saul, and Jonathan were buried, Josh. xviii. 28; 2 Sam. xxi. 14. Some identify it with Zelzah, near Bethlehem, 1 Sam. x. 2; but the LXX. render "dancing greatly," instead of "at Zelzah"—that is, rejoicing because the asses were found.]

[ZELOPHEHAD. The father of five daughters, in behalf of whom the law was made by which daughters, when there was no male issue in the family, inherited the paternal estate. Num. xxvii. 33; xxviii. 1-11.]

[ZENAS. A lawyer. Titus iii. 13.]

[ZEPHANIAH was the son of Cushi, and was probably of a noble family of the tribe of Simeon. He prophesied in the reign of Josiah, about B. C. 630. He denounces the judgments of God against the idolatry and sins of his countrymen, and exhorts them to repentance; he predicts the punishment of the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ethiopians, and foretells the destruction of Nineveh; he again inveighs against the corruptions of Jerusalem, and with his threats mixes promises of future favor and prosperity to his people, whose recall from their dispersion shall glorify the name of God throughout the world. The style of Zephaniah is poetical; but it is not distinguished by any peculiar elegance or beauty, though generally animated and impressive.]

[Others of this name are mentioned, 2 Kings xxv. 18; Jer. xxix. 25, 29; Zech. vi. 10, 14.]

[ZEPHATH. One of the "utmost cities of Judah, toward the coast of Edom, southward," destroyed by Judah and Simeon, and hence called Hormah, which means destruction. Num. xiv. 45; xxi. 3; Josh. xii. 14; xv. 30; xix. 4: Deut. i. 44. Robinson finds the name in es-Sufâh—a rocky pass leading out of the Wady Fikreh.]

[ZEPHATHAH. A valley near Mareshah. 2 Chron. xiv. 10. Robinson suggests that the name may be found in Tell es-Sâfeh, which was celebrated in the time of the Crusades. "It may have been the broad Wady coming down from Beit Jibrin toward Tell es-Sâfeh." See MARESHAH.]

[ZERED. A valley, or brook, on the southern border of Moab. Num. xxi. 12: Deut. ii. 13, 14, 18. It is, perhaps, "the brook of the willows," or "the valley of the Arabians," τὴν φάραγγα Ἀραβίας, LXX. Isa. xv. 7. Some identify it with "the river of the wilderness," or "the valley of the Arabah." Amos vi. 14. Robinson thinks it was the Wady el-Ashy, which separates the district of Kerak from Jebâl, and forms a natural division between the country on the north and on the south. Taking its rise near the castle el-Ashy on the route of the Syrian Haj, upon the high eastern desert, it breaks down through the whole chain of mountains to near the south-east corner of the Dead Sea, forming for a part of the way a deep chasm. The Israelites doubtless passed it near its upper end, where it would present no difficulty.]

[ZERESH. Haman's wife. Esth. v. 10.]

[ZERUBBABEL, or ZEROBABEL, was son of Salathiel, of the royal race of David. St. Matthew, i. 12, and 1 Chron. iii. 17, 19, make Jecothiah, King of Judah, to be father to Salathiel; but they do not agree as to the father of Zerub-babel. The Chronicles say Pedaiah was father of Zerubbabel; but St. Matthew, St. Luke, Ezra, and Haggai, constantly make Salathiel his father. We must therefore take the name of son in the sense of grandson, and say that Salathiel having educated Zerubbabel, he was always afterward looked upon as his father. Some think that Zerubbabel had also the name of Sheshbazzar, and that he has this name in Ezra i. 8. Zerubbabel returned to Jerusalem long before the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes. He returned at the beginning of the reign of Cyrus, A. M. 3468, fifteen years before Darius. Cyrus committed to his care the sacred vessels of the temple, with which he returned to Jerusalem. Ezra i. 11. He is always named first, as being the chief of the Jews that returned to their own country, Ezra ii. 2; iii. 8; v. 2; he laid the foundations of the temple, Ezra iii. 8, 9: Zech. iv. 9, etc.; and restored the worship of the Lord and the usual sacrifices. When the Samaritans offered to assist in rebuilding the temple, Zerubbabel and the principal men of Judah refused them this honor, since Cyrus had granted his commission to the Jews only. Ezra iv. 2, 3.

[ZERUIAH. Sister of David, and mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel. 2 Sam. ii. 18: 1 Chron. ii. 15, 16.]

[ZIBA. Servant of Saul: he had charge of Mephibosheth. 2 Sam. ix.; xvi.; xix. 24-30.]

[ZIBEON. Grandfather of Aholiabamah, one of Esau's wives. Gen. xxxvi. 2, 14, 24, 25.]

[ZIDON. See SIDON.]

[ZIF. The second month of the sacred year. 1 Kings vi. 1.]

[ZIKLAG, a city of the Philistines, first assigned to the tribe of Judah, and afterward to that of Simeon, Josh. xv. 31; xix. 5; but it does not appear that the Philistines were ever driven out; as, when David fled into their country from Saul, Achish gave the city to him. 1 Sam. xxvii. 5, 6. It was afterward burned by the Amalekites, 1 Sam. xxx. 1. But it appears to have been rebuilt, as the author of the First Book of Samuel, when relating its being given to David, adds, that it pertained to the kings of Judah in his time.

[ZILLAH. One of Lamech's wives. Gen. iv. 19-23.]

[ZILPAH. Leah's maid, and one of Jacob's wives. Gen. xxix. 24; xxx. 9-13.]

[ZIMRAM. Son of Abraham and Keturah. Gen. xxv. 2.]

[ZIMRI. Son of Zerah. 1 Chron. ii. 6; called Zabdi, Josh. vii. 1.—Son of Salu. Num. xxv. 14.—Assassin and successor of Elah, King of Israel. 1 Kings xvi. 8-20.]

[ZIN. A desert, south of Palestine, and west of Idumea: Kadesh-barnea was in it. Num. xiii. 21; xx. 1: Josh. xv. 1. It is now called el Ghor.]

[ZION. See SION.]

[ZIPH. A city about five miles south-east of Hebron. Josh. xv. 55. There was a wilderness adjacent. 1 Sam. xxiii. 14-24; xxvi. 1, 2. The hill of Zif is described by Robinson as "a round eminence situated in the plain, a hundred feet or more in height, on the road from Hebron to Kurmul. The proper ruins of Ziph lie about ten minutes east of this point, on a low hill or ridge between two small Wadys, which commence here and run toward the Dead Sea. There is little to be seen except broken walls and foundations, most of them of unhewn stone, but indicating solidity, and covering a considerable tract of ground. In the middle is a low, massive, square building, constructed of squared stones, and vaulted within with pointed arches, showing that the place must have been inhabited long after the Mohammedan conquest. Cisterns also remain; and in the midst of the ruins is a narrow sloping passage, cut down into the rock, terminating at a door with a subterranean chamber beyond, which may have served as a tomb, or more probably as a magazine. Ziph is mentioned by Jerome as existing in his day, eastward from Hebron. From that time to the present there is no trace of the name in history.”]

[ZIPPORAH. Wife of Moses. She was an Arabian Cushite, being the daughter of Reuel, a priest or prince of Midian. Exod. ii. 15-22: Num. xii. 1. Compare Hab. iii. 7. One of her children does not appear to have been circumcised at the proper time, in consequence of which neglect, the life of Moses—though some understand it of his son, according to Gen. xvii. 14—was in peril: “the Lord sought to kill him;” whereupon Zipporah circumcised her son with a sharp stone, and said to Moses, as some understand it, “A bloody husband thou art, because of the circumcision;” and as she returned to Midian, they think she abandoned for a time both Moses and his religion. But as זררן, here rendered husband, means properly a male relative by marriage, and particularly a father-in-law, others think it refers to Jehovah. Zipporah, a Midianitess, and consequently an alien from the people of Jehovah, yet claimed him for her father-in-law by the circumcision of her son. Her conduct was approved and her claim admitted, as Jehovah “let him go”—that is, did not kill Moses—and she said, “He (Jehovah) is a father-in-law by blood, on account of the circumcision.” For other interpretations of this difficult passage, see Mede, Boothroyd, and A. Clarke, in loc. Zipporah and her sons rejoined Moses after the Exodus. Exod. xviii.]

[ZIZ. A cliff, or ascent, maaleh, near En-gedi. 2 Chron. xx. 16.]

[ZOAN. A city in Egypt. The LXX., Vulgate, and interpreters generally, consider it Tanis. It was built seven years after Hebron. Num. xiii. 22. It was the metropolis of Pharaoh, where Moses wrought his miracles. Ps. lxxviii. 12. The predictions concerning its overthrow have been literally fulfilled. Isa. xix. 11-13: Ezek. xiii. 14. Its ruins, called San, are pointed out on the east of the Tanitic branch of the Nile, thirteen miles south-west of Menzaleh: they consist of large mounds, and remains of a great temple, walls, columns, and obelisks. The plain of San, “the field of Zoan,” once remarkable for fertility, is now a desert.]

[ZOAR. One of the cities of the plain, which was spared at the request of Lot, when the rest were overthrown. It was at first called Bela. Gen. xiv. 2; xix. 17-30. It is called Zoara by Josephus, Segor by the LXX., Jerome, and others, and Zoghar by Abulfeda. It is spoken of as a city of Moab, Deut. xxiv. 3: Isa. xv. 5: Jer. xlviii. 34. Eusebius and Jerome describe it in their day as having many inhabitants, and a Roman garrison. It was the seat of a bishop in the Third Palestine. The Crusaders speak of it as pleasantly situated, with many palm trees. De Saulcy identifies it with Zuweirah, west of the Dead Sea; but Robinson seems to demonstrate that it was on the east, in Wady Kerak, where Irby and Mangles found ruins of a place of considerable size, among which were a column and some antique variegated glass: they considered this the site of Zoar. Lieut. Lynch places it in that locality.]

[ZOBAB. A province of Syria, extending to the Euphrates. 1 Sam. xiv. 47: 2 Sam. viii. 3; x. 6; xxiii. 36: 1 Kings xi. 23, 24: 1 Chron. xviii. 3, 9.]

[ZOHARITES. A sect of Jews, who derive their name from their attachment to the Book Zohar, or Sohar. They give a mystical interpretation to the Scriptures, recognize a trinity of persons in Elohim, believe that there was a Divine incarnation in Adam, and that there will be another in the Messiah, who will not be a temporal king, but will atone for the sins of the world. The sect was revived in 1750 by Jacob Frank, a Polish Jew. They were hated by the Rabbins, because of their approximation to Christianity.]

[ZOPHAR. See Job.]

[ZORAH. The birthplace of Samson. Judg. xiii. 2. It was first given to Judah, and afterward assigned to Dan. Josh. xv. 33; xix. 41. Eusebius and Jerome place it ten miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Nicopolis. Robinson identifies it with Sur'a, which he visited in 1838 and 1852. He says, “It is situated on a sharp point or Tell, as steep and regular almost as a volcanic cone. It is a miserable village, exposed to the burning rays of the sun without shade. There are no traces of antiquity, except that the rocks on the summit have been hewn away in several places. But, with the exception of one cistern with steps, we could not make out for what purpose this was done. The Wely just by the village has several large tombs in its court. The prospect from the summit is extensive and fine. 'Ain Shems, the ancient Beth-shemesh, was before us, a noble site for a city.” “Not far from Zorah lay Zanoah, Tibneh, or Timnath, lies south of west from Zorah, not more than an hour distant from it.”]

[ZUINGLIANS. Followers of Ulric Zuingle, or Zuinglius. He was canon of Zurich, Switzerland. He began the Reformation in 1516, by explaining the Scriptures, and inveighing against the superstitions of Popery. In 1519 he confronted an Italian monk, named Bernardine Samson, who was carrying on in Switzerland the traffic in Indulgences. By his great learning, zeal, and intrepidity, he greatly promoted the cause of the Reformation, and is considered the founder of the Reformed Church. He aimed at the elimination of every vestige of error in the doctrine, and of superstition in the worship, of the Church; and in particular held, in opposition to Luther, that the body and blood of Christ are only symbolically present in the eucharist.

He fell in a battle fought in 1530, between the Papists and Protestants. After his death his system was modified by Calvin, particularly by grafting on it the dogma of absolute predestination; by reducing the power in religious matters allowed by Zuinglius to the magistrate; by disallowing the quasi episcopacy which he sanctioned; and by rejecting the mere figurative, and asserting a real though undefinable spiritual presence of the body and blood of Christ in the supper of the Lord. See CALVINISM and TRAN-SUBSTANTIATION.]

[ZUPH. An ancestor of Samuel: he seems to have given name to a territory on the south of Benjamin, where his posterity lived. 1 Sam. i. 1; ix. 5. Robinson thinks it is Sôba. See RAMAH.]

[ZUR. A prince of Midian. Num. xxv. 15; xxx. 8: Josh. xiii. 21.]

[ZURIEL. A Merarite chief. Num. iii. 35.]

[ZURISHADDAI. A prince of Simeon. Num. i. 6.]

ZUZIM. See ZAMZUMMIM.

ALPHABETICAL TABLE

OF THE

PROPER NAMES

IN THE

OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS;

WITH THEIR PRONUNCIATION, AND THE CHIEF MEANING OR LEADING SIGNIFICATION OF EACH WORD IN ITS ORIGINAL LANGUAGE.

In those words whose pronounciation cannot be mistaken by any one, such as ABNER, ADDON, ASSOS, etc., only the accentuation is marked.

In the explanation of the different names, attention has been given to the leading meaning, whether simple or metaphorical; and the reader is here presented with the converse of each signification, such as "ABIAH, the Lord is my Father, or the Father of the Lord;" "ELIAM, the people of God, or the God of the people;" because in the Hebrew, as in most of the oriental languages, the choice of these meanings is determinable principally by the juxtaposition of the words as they stand in different sentences, and by other circumstances of a similar kind.

ABI

AARON, Ay'ron, lofty, mountainous.
 ABAD'DON, the destroyer.
 ABAGTHA, Ab-ag'-tha, father of the wine-press.
 ABANA, Ab-ay'-nah, stony.
 ABARIM, Ab'-a-rim, passages.
 AB'ARON, strength.
 AB'BA, father.
 AB'DA, a servant.
 AB'DI, my servant.
 ABDIEL, Ab'-de-el, a servant of God.
 AB'DON, a servant.
 ABED-NEGO, A-bed'-ne-go, servant of light.
 A'BEL, vanity, vapor, mourning.
 ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH, Ay'-bel-beth-ma-ay'-kah, mourning of the house of Maachah.
 A'BEL-MA'IM, the mourning of the waters.
 ABEL-MEHOLOAH, Ay'-bel-me-ho'-lah, mourning of weakness, of sickness.
 ABEL-MIZRAIM, Ay'-bel-miz-ra'-im, the mourning of the Egyptians.
 A'BEL-SHIT'TIM, mourning of the thorns.
 A'BEZ, an egg, muddy.
 A-BI, A'-be, my father.
 ABIAH, Ab-i'-ah, the Lord is my father.
 ABI'AHIL, the father of light or praise.
 ABI-ALBON, A-be-al'-bon, intelligent father.
 AB'IAM, the father of the sea.
 AB-AS'APH, a gathering or consuming father.
 ABIATHAR, Ab-i'-a-thar, excellent father.
 A'BIB, green fruits, ears of corn.
 ABI'DAH, father of knowledge.
 ABI'DAN, father of judgment.
 ABIEL, Ab'-e-el, God my father.
 ABIEZER, Ab-e-e'-zer, father of help.
 ABI-EZRITE, Ab-e-ez'-rite.
 ABIGAIL, Ab'-e-gal, the joy of the father.

ACC

ABI'-GIBEON, the father of the cup, father of Gibeon.
 ABIHAIL, Ab-e-hay'-il, the father of strength.
 ABI'HU, he is my father, or his father.
 ABI'HUD, the father of praise or confession.
 ABIJAH, Ab-i'-jah, the will of the Lord.
 ABI'JAM, father of the sea.
 ABILENE, Ab-e-le'-ne, the father of the apartment, or of mourning.
 ABIMAEI, Ab-be-may'-el, a father sent from God, my father comes from God.
 ABIMELECH, Ab-im'-me-lek, father of the king.
 ABINADAB, Ab-in'-na-dab, father of willingness, my father is a prince.
 ABINOAM, Ab-in'-no-am, father of beauty or comeliness, my father is beautiful.
 ABIRAM, Ab-i'-ram, a high father, father of fraud.
 ABISHAG, Ab'-be-shag, ignorance of the father.
 ABISHAI, Ab-bish'-a-i, the present of my father, the father of the sacrifice.
 ABISHALOM, Ab-bish'-a-lom, the father of peace, the recompense of the father.
 ABISHUA, Ab-bish'-u-a, father of salvation, or of magnificence.
 ABISHUR, Ab'-be-shur, the father of the wall, or of uprightness.
 ABITAL, Ab'-be-tal, the father of the dew.
 ABITUB, Ab'-be-tub, father of goodness.
 ABIUD, Ab'-be-ud, father of praise.
 AB'NER, father of light, the son of the father.
 A'BRAHAM, the father of a great multitude.
 A'BRAM, a high father, the father of elevation.
 AB'SALOM, father of peace.
 ACCAD, Ak'-ad, a pitcher, a sparkle.
 ACHO, Ak'-ko, close, pressed together.

ACELDAMA, [A-cel'-da-mah, or] A-kel'-da-mah, the field of blood.
 ACHAIA, A-kay'-yah, grief, trouble.
 ACHAICUS, A-kay'-e-kus, a native of Achaia.
 ACHAN, ACHAR, A'-kan, A'-kar, he that troubles and bruises.
 ACHBOR, Ak'-bor, a rat, bruising.
 ACHIM, A'-kim, preparing, confirming, revenging.
 ACHIR, A'-ker, the brother's light.
 ACHISH, A'-kish, thus it is, how is this?
 ACHMETHA, Ak'-me-thah.
 ACHOR, A'-kor, trouble.
 ACHSAH, Ak'-sah, adorned, bursting of the veil.
 ACHSERAPH, Ak'-shaph, poison, tricks, one that breaks, the brim of any thing.
 ACHZIB, Ak'-zib, liar, one that runs.
 ADAHAH, Ad'-a-dah, the testimony of the assembly.
 ADAH, Ay'-dah, an assembly.
 ADAIAH, Ad'-a'-yah, the witness of the Lord.
 ADALIAH, Ad'-a-ly'-ah, one that draws water poverty, cloud, death.
 AD'AM, earthy, taken out of red earth.
 ADAMAH, Ad'-da-mah, red earth.
 ADAMI, Ad'-da-my, my man, red, earthy.
 A'DAE, high, eminent.
 ADBEEL, Ad'-be-el, a vapor, a cloud of God, a vexer of God.
 AD'DI, my witness, adorned, passage, prey.
 AD'DON, basis, foundation, the Lord.
 ADIEL, Ad'-i-el, the witness of the Lord.
 ADIN, Ad'-din, adorned, dainty.
 ADITHAIM, Ad'-e-thay'-im, assemblies, testimonies.
 ADLAI, Ad-lay'-i, my witness, my ornament.
 AD'MAH, earthy, red earth.
 ADMATHA, Ad'-ma-thah, a cloud of death, a mortal vapor.
 AD'NAH, rest, testimony, eternal.
 ADONA'I, my Lord.
 ADONI-BEZEK, Ad'-o-ne-bee'-zek, the lightning of the Lord, the Lord of Bezek.
 ADONIJAH, Ad-o-ny'-jah, the Lord is my master.
 ADONIKAM, Ad-o-ny'-kam, the Lord is raised, my Lord hath raised me.
 ADONIRAM, Ad-o-ny'-ram, my Lord is most high, the Lord of might and elevation.
 ADONI-ZEDEK, Ad'-o-ne-zee'-dek, justice of the Lord.
 ADORAM, Ad-o-ray'-im, strength or power of the sea.
 ADORAM, Ad'-o-ram, their beauty, their power, their praise.
 ADRAMMELECH, Ad-ram'-me-lek, the cloak or glory of the king.
 ADRAMYTUM, Ad-ra-mil'-te-um, the court of death.
 ADRIA, Ay'-dre-ah, the name of a city, which gives name to the Adriatic Sea, now the Gulf of Venice.
 A'DRIEL, the flock of God.
 ADULLAM, Ad-ul'-lam, their testimony, their prey, their ornament.
 ADUM'MIM, earthy or bloody things.
 Æ'NEAS, praised.
 AGABUS, Ag'-ga-bus, a locust, the feast of the father.
 AGAG, Ay'-gag, roof, floor.

A'GAGITE, of the race of Agag.
 AGA'PÆ, love-feasts.
 AGAR, see Hagar.
 AGI'E, a valley, deepness.
 AGRIPPA, A-grip'-pah, one who at his birth causes great pain.
 A'GUR, a stranger, gathering.
 A'HAB, the brother of the father.
 AHA'RAH, a sweet brother, an odoriferous meadow.
 AHAR'HEL, another host, another sorrow, the sleep of the brother.
 AHASBA'I, trusting in me, brother compassing.
 In Syriac, a brother of age.
 AHASUERUS, A-has-u-e'-rus, prince, chief.
 AHAV, A-hay'-vah, essence, generation.
 A'HAZ, one that takes and possesses.
 AHAZIAH, A-ha-zy'-ah, possession, vision of the Lord.
 AHI, my brother, my brethren.
 AHIAH, A-hy'-ah, brother of the Lord.
 AHIAM, A-hy'-am, brother of the mother, brother of the nation.
 AHIAN, A-hy'-an, brother of wine.
 AHIE'ZER, brother of assistance.
 AHI'HUD, brother of vanity, a brother of praise.
 AHIJAH, the same as Ahiah.
 AHIKAM, A-hy'-kam, a brother that raises up.
 AHI'LUD, a brother born.
 AHIM'AAZ, brother of the council.
 AHI'MAN, a brother prepared.
 AHIMELECH, A-him'-me-lek, my brother is a king.
 AHIMOTH, A'-he-moth, brother of death.
 AHIN'ADAB, a willing brother, a brother of a vow, brother of the prince.
 AHINOAM, A-hin'-no-am, the beauty and comeliness of the brother.
 AHI'O, his brother, his brethren.
 AHIOR. See Achior.
 AHIRA, A-hy'-rah, brother of iniquity, or of the shepherd.
 AHIRAM, A-hy'-ram, brother of craft, protection.
 AHISAMACH, A-his'-sa-mak, brother of strength, or of support.
 AHISHABAR, A-his'-sa-bar, brother of the morning or dew, brother of blackness.
 AHI'SHAR, brother of a prince.
 AHITHOPHEL, A-hit'-to-fel, brother of ruin or folly.
 AHI'TUB, brother of goodness.
 AH'LAB, which is of milk, is fat.
 AH'LAI, beseeching, sorrowing, beginning, brother to me.
 AHO'AH, a thistle, a thorn, a fish-hook, brotherhood.
 AHO'HI, a living brother, my thistle or thorn.
 AHO'LAH, his tabernacle, his tent.
 AHOLIAB, A-ho'-le-ab, the tent or tabernacle of the father.
 AHOLIBAH, A-ho'-le-bah, my tent and my tabernacle in her.
 AHOLIBAMAH, A-ho'-le-bay'-mah, my tabernacle is exalted.
 AHRAN, see Charran.
 AHU'MAR, a meadow of waters, brother of waters.
 AHU'ZAH, their taking possession, vision.
 AHUZ'ZAH, possession, apprehension, vision.
 AI, or HAI, Ay'-i, mass, heap.
 AI'AH, a raven, a vulture, alas, where is it?

AI'ATH, 'an hour.

AI'N, an eye, a fountain.

AIOTH, the same as Ai.

AJALON, Ad'-ja-lon, a chain, strength, a stag.

AK'KUB, the print of the foot where any creature hath gone, supplantation.

ALAMMELECH, Al-am'-me-lek, God is king.

AL'CIMUS, strong, of strength.

AL'EMETH, a hiding, youth, worlds, upon the dead.

AL'EMIS, strength.

ALEXAN'DER, one that assists men, one that turns away evil.

ALEXANDRIA, Al-ex-an'-dre-a, the city of Alexander.

A'LIAN, high.

ALLELUIA, Al-le-lu'-yah, praise the Lord.

AL'LOH, an oak.

ALLON-BACHUTH, Al'-lon-bak'-kuth, the oak of weeping.

ALMO'DAD, measure of God.

AL'MON, hidden.

AL'MON-DIB'LATHAIM, a hiding, a heap of fig trees.

ALPHA, Al'-fah, the first letter of the Greek alphabet, marked A.

ALPHEUS, Al-fe'-us, a thousand, chief.

A'MAD, a people of witness, people everlasting.

AM'ALEK, a people that licks up or uses ill.

AMAL'EKITES, people descended from Amalek.

A'MAM, mother, fear of them, people.

AMANA, Am-ay'-nah, integrity and truth.

AMARIAH, Am-a-ry'-ah, the Lord says, the excellency of the Lord.

AMASA, Am-ay'-sah, a forgiving people, the burden of the people.

AMAZIAH, Am-a-zy'-ah, the strength of the Lord.

A'MI. See Amam.

AM'MAH, my people.

AMMI, the same as Ammah.

AMMIHUB, Am'-me-hud, people of praise.

AMMINADAB, Am-min'-na-dab, prince of the people, a people that vows.

AMMISHADDAI, Am'-me-shad'-day-i, the people of the Almighty.

AM'MON, the son of my people.

AM'MONITES, a people descended from Benammi, son of Lot.

AM'NON, faithful and true, foster-father.

AMON, Ay'-mon, faithful, true.

AM'ORITE, bitter, a rebel, a babbler.

AMOS, Ay'-mos, loading, weighty.

AMAZ, Ay'-moz, strong, robust.

AMPHIPOLIS, Am-fip'-po-lis, a city encompassed by the sea.

AMPLIAS, Am'-ple-as, large, extensive.

AM'RAM, an exalted people, handfuls of corn.

AMRAPHEL, Am'-ra-fel, one that speaks of hidden things or of ruin.

AM'ZI, strong, mighty.

A'NAB, a grape, a knot.

ANAH, Ay'-nah, one who answers or sings, poor, afflicted.

ANAK, Ay'-nak, a collar, an ornament.

ANAKIMS, An'-ak-ims. See Anak.

ANAMMELECH, An-am'-me-lek, answer, song of the king.

A'NAN, a cloud, a prophecy.

ANANIAS, An-a-ny'-as, the cloud of the Lord.

ANATHOTH, An'-a-thoth, answer, affliction.

ANDREW, An'-dru-e, a stout and strong man.

ANDRONICUS, An-dron'-ne-kus, a man excelling others.

ANER, Ay'-ner, answer, song, affliction.

AN'NA, gracious, merciful.

AN'NAS, one that answers, that afflicts.

AN'TICHRIST, an adversary to Christ.

ANTIOCH, An'-te-ok, instead of a chariot.

AN'TIPAS, against all.

ANTIPATRIS, An-te-pay'-tris, against his own father.

APELLES, A-pel'-lees, to exclude, to separate.

APHEK, Ay'-fek, a stream, vigor.

APOLLONIA, Ap-po-lo'-ne-ah, perdition.

APOL'LOS, one that destroys and lays waste.

APOLLYON, A-pol'-le-on, one that exterminates or destroys.

APPHIA, Af'-e-ah, that is fruitful.

APPII-FORUM, Ap'-pe-i-fo'-rum, a town so called from Appius Claudius, whose statue was erected there.

AQUILA, Ak'-we-lah, an eagle.

AR, awaking, uncovering.

ARA'BIA, evening, a place wild and desert; mixtures, because this country was inhabited by different kinds of people.

ARA'BIAN, an inhabitant of Arabia.

A'RAD, a wild ass, a dragon.

A'RAM, magnificence, one that deceives.

ARARAT, Ar'-ra-rat, the curse of trembling.

ARAUNAH, A-raw'-nah, ark, song, curse.

AR'BA, the city of the four.

ARCHELAUS, Ar-ke'-lay-us, the prince of the people.

ARCHIPPUS, Ar-kip'-pus, governor of horses.

ARCTURUS, Ark-tew'-rus, a gathering together.

ARD, one that commands.

ARELI, Ar-e'-lie, the light or vision of God.

AREOPAGITE, Ar-e-op'-a-gyte, [or Ar-e-op'-a-jite,] belonging to the council called Areopagus.

AREOPAGUS, Ar-e-op'-a-gus, the hill of Mars; a place where the magistrates of Athens held their supreme council; from ἀρείος, "of Mars," and πάγος, "a hill."

ARETAS, A-re'-tas, one that is agreeable or virtuous.

AR'GOB, a turf of earth, curse of the well.

ARIEL, Ay'-re-el, the altar, light, lion of God.

ARIMATHEA, Ar-re-ma-the'-ah, a lion dead to the Lord. Ramath, or Ramah, a city where Samuel dwelt.

ARIOCH, Ar'-e-ok, long, your drunkenness, your lion.

ARISTARCHUS, A-ris-tar'-kus, the best prince.

ARISTOBULUS, A-ris-tob'-bu-lus, a good counselor.

ARMAGEDDON, Ar-ma-ged'-don, the mountain of Megiddo, of the gospel, of fruits.

ARMENIA, Ar-me'-ne-ah, a province which is supposed to take its name from Aram.

AR'NON, rejoicing, their ark.

AR'OEER, heath, tamarisk, the nakedness of the skin or of the enemy.

AR'PAD, the light of redemption, that lies down.

ARPHAXAD, Ar-fak'-sad, one that heals or releases.

ARTAXERXES, Ar-taks-erk'-ses, in Hebrew, Artachsasta, the silence of light.

ARTEMAS, Ar'-te-mas, whole, sound.
 ASA, Ay'-sah, physician, cure.
 ASAHIEL, As'-a-el, the work or creature of God.
 ASALAH, As'-a-i-ah, the Lord hath wrought.
 ASAPH, Ay'-saf, one that assembles together.
 ASENATH, As'-e-nath, peril, misfortune.
 A'SHAN, vapor, smoke.
 ASH'DOD, inclination, a wild open place.
 ASH'ER, blessedness.
 AS'HIEL, the work of God.
 ASHIMA, Ash'-e-mah, crime, position, fire of the sea.
 ASHKENAZ, Ash'-ke-naz, a fire that distils or spreads.
 ASHTAROTH, Ash'-ta-roth, flocks, riches.
 ASH'UR, one that is happy.
 ASH'VATH, making vestments.
 ASIA, Ay'-she-a, muddy, boggy.
 AS'KELOH, weight, balance, fire of infamy.
 ASNAP'PER, unhappiness, fruitless.
 ASSIR, prisoner, fettered.
 AS'SOS, approaching.
 ASSYRIA, As-sir'-re-a.
 ASSYRIAN, As-sir'-re-an.
 ASYNCRITUS, A-sin'-kre-tus, incomparable.
 A'TAD, a thorn.
 ATA'ROTH, crowns, counsel of making full.
 ATHALIAH, Ath-a-ly'-ah, the time of the Lord.
 ATHENIANS, Ath-ee'-ne-ans, inhabitants of Athens.
 ATH'ENS, so called from Athene, Minerva.
 ATTALIA, At-ta-ly'-ah, that increases or sends.
 AUGUSTUS, increased, majestic.
 A'VEN, iniquity, force, riches.
 AZARIAH, Az-a-ry'-ah, assistance, he that hears the Lord.
 AZEKAH, Az-ee'-kah, strength of walls.
 AZ'GAD, a strong army, a gang of robbers.
 AZNOTH-TABOR, Az'-noth-tay'-bor, the ears of Tabor, of choice, purity, contrition.
 AZO'TUS, the same as Ashdod.
 A'ZUR, he that assists, that is assisted.

BAAL, Bay'-al, he that rules and subdues.
 BAALAH, Bay'-al-ah, her idol, a spouse, the name of a city.
 BAAL-BERITH, Bay'-al-be'-rith, idol of the covenant.
 BAAL-GAD, Bay'-al-gad', the idol of the troop, the Lord is master of the troop.
 BAAL-HAMON, Bay'-al-hay'-mon, one that rules a multitude, a populous place.
 BAAL-HAZER, Bay'-al-hay'-zer, lord of court, possessor of grace.
 BA'AL-HER'MON, the possessor of destruction, of a thing devoted to God.
 BA'ALI, my idol, or master.
 BA'ALIM, idols, masters.
 BA'ALIS, a rejoicing, proud lord.
 BAAL-MEON, Bay'-al-me'-on, the idol, the master of the house.
 BAAL-PHOR, Bay'-al-pe'-or, master of the opening.
 BAAL-PERAZIM, Bay'-al-per'-a-zim, master, or god of divisions.
 BAAL-SHALISHA, Bay'-al-shal'-e-shah, the third idol, the third husband.
 BAAL-TAMAR, Bay'-al-tay'-mar, master of the palm tree.
 BAAL-ZEBUB, Bay'-al-ze'-bub, the master of flies.

BAAL-ZEPHON, Bay'-al-ze'-fon, the idol of the north, secret.
 BAANAH, Bay'-a-nah, in the answer, in affliction.
 BAA'RAH, a flame, purging.
 BAASHAH, Ba-ay'-shah, in the work, he that demands, who lays waste.
 BA'BEL, confusion, mixture.
 BABYLON, Bab'-be-lon. See Babel.
 BABYLONIANS, Bab-be-lo'-ne-ans.
 BABYLONISH, Bab-be-lo'-nish.
 BACA, Bay'-kah, mulberry tree.
 BAHURIM, Ba-hew'-rim, choice, warlike.
 BA'JITH, a house.
 BALAAM, Bay'-lam, the old age or ancient of the people, without the people.
 BALA'DAN, one without rule or judgment, ancient in judgment.
 BA'LAK, who lays waste, who laps.
 BA'MAH, an eminence.
 BARABBAS, Bar-ab'-bas, son of the father or of confusion.
 BARACHEL, Bar'-a-kel, who blesses God.
 BARACHIAS, Bar'-a-ky-as, the same as Barachel.
 BA'RAK, thunder, in vain.
 BAR-JE'SUS, son of Jesus.
 BAR-JO'NA, son of Jona or of a dove.
 BAR'NABAS, the son of the prophet or of consolation.
 BAR'SABAS, son of return, of rest, of swearing.
 BARTHOLOMEW, a son that suspends the waters.
 BARTIMEUS, Bar-te-me'-us, the son of Timeus or of the honorable.
 BARUCH, Bay'-ruk, who is blessed, who bends the knee.
 BARZILLAI, Bar-zil'-la-i, made of iron, son of contempt.
 BA'SHAN, in the tooth, in the change or sleep.
 BASHEMATH, Bash'-e-math, perfumed, in desolation.
 BATH-SHEBA, Bath-she'-bah, or Bath'-she-bah, the seventh daughter, the daughter of an oath.
 BATHSHU'A, the daughter of salvation.
 BE'DAD, alone, in friendship.
 BE'DAN, only, in the judgment.
 BEEL-ZEBUB, Be-el'-ze-bub. See Baal-zebub.
 BEER, Be'-er, a well, the name of a city.
 BEER-LAHAI-ROI, Be'-er-la-hay'-e-roy, the well of him that liveth and seeth me.
 BEER-SHEBA, Be'-er-she'-bah, the well of an oath, of satiety, the seventh well.
 BE'KAH, half a shekel.
 BEL, ancient, nothing, subject to change.
 BELIAL, Beel'-le-al, wicked, the devil.
 BELSHAZ'ZAR, master of the treasure.
 BELTESHAZ'ZAR, who lays up treasures in secret, secretly endures pain and pressure.
 BENAIAH, Ben-ay'-yah, son of the Lord, the Lord's building.
 BEN-AM'MI, the son of my people.
 BENHA'DAD, the son of Hadad, of noise.
 BEN'JAMIN, the son of the right hand.
 BEN'JAMITE, a descendant of Benjamin.
 BENONI, Ben-o'-ny, son of my grief.
 BE'OR, burning, mad, beast.
 BERACHAH, Ber'-a-kah, blessing.
 BEREA, Be-ree'-ah, heavy, from βάρος.
 BE'RITH, covenant.
 BERNICE, Ber-ny'-se, one that brings victory.
 BE'SOR, glad news, incarnation.

BE'TAH, confidence.

BETHABARA, Beth-ab'-ba-rah, the house of passage, of anger.

BETH'ANY, the house of song, of affliction, of obedience, the grace of the Lord.

BETH-A'VEN, the house of vanity, of strength.

BETH-BIREI, Beth-bir'-re-i, the house of my Creator.

BETH'-CAR, the house of the lamb of knowledge.

BETH-DA'GON, the house of corn, of the fish, of the god Dagon.

BETH-DIBLATHAIM, Beth-dib-la-thay'-im, the house of dry figs.

BETH'EL, the house of God.

BETHELITE, Beth'-el-ite, an inhabitant of Bethel.

BE'THER, division, in the turtle, in the trial.

BETHES'DA, the house of effusion, of pity.

BETH-E'ZEL, a neighbor's house.

BETH-GAMUL, Beth-gay'-mul, the house of recompense, of the weaned, of the camel.

BETH-HACEREM, Beth-hak'-ke-rem, [or Beth-hak'-se-rem,] the house of the vineyard.

BETH-HO'RON, the house of wrath, of the hole, of liberty.

BETHJESH'IMOTH, the house of desolation.

BETH'-LEHEM, the house of bread, of war.

BETH-LEHEM-EPHRATAH, Beth'-le-hem-eff-ray'-iah or eff'-ra-tah.

BETH'-LEHEMITE, an inhabitant of Bethlehem.

BETH'-LEHEM-JU'DAH.

BETH-PE'OR, the house of gaping.

BETHPHAGE, Beth'-fa-je, the house of the mouth, of early figs.

BETHSAIDA, Beth-say'-dah, the house of fruits, of hunters.

BETH'-SHAN, the house of the tooth, of change, of sleep.

BETH-SHE'MESH, the house of the sun.

BETHUEL, Beth-ew'-el, filiation of God.

BEULAH, Bew'-lah, married.

BEZALEEL, Bez-a-lee'-el, in the shadow of God.

BE'ZEK, lightning, in chains.

BICHLI, Bick'-ry, first-born, in the ram.

BID'KAR, in compunction, in sharp pain.

BIG'THAN, giving meat.

BIL'DAD, old friendship.

BIL'HAH, who is old, troubled, confused.

BIR'SHA, in evil, son that beholds.

BITHIAH, Be-thy'-ah, daughter of the Lord.

BITH'RON, division, in his examination, daughter of the song, of anger, of liberty.

BITHYNIA, Be-thin'-e-ah, violent precipitation.

BLAS'TUS, one that sprouts and brings forth.

BOANERGES, Bo-a-ner'-jes, the sons of thunder;

James and John, the sons of Zebedee.

BO'AZ, or Bo'oz, in strength, in the goat.

BOCHIM, Bo'-kim, the place of weeping, of mulberry trees.

BO'ZEZ, mud, in the flower.

BOZ'RAH, in tribulation or distress.

BUL, changeable, perishing.

BUZ, despised, plundered.

BUZI, Bew'-zye, my contempt.

BUZITE, a descendant from Buz.

CABUL, Kay'-bul, displeasing, dirt.

CÆSAR, See'-sar, one cut out.

CÆSAREA, Ses-a-ree'-a, a bush of hair.

CALAPHAS, Kay'-a-fas, a searcher.

CAIN, Kay'n, possession.

CAINAN, Kay'-nan, possessor, one that laments.

CA'LAH, good opportunity, as the verdure.

CA'LEB, a dog, a crow, a basket.

CALEB-EPHRATAH, Kay'-leb-ef-ray'-tah or eff'-ra-tah, a place so called by a conjunction of the names of Caleb and his wife Ephratah.

CALNEH, Kal'-nay, our consumption, all we, as murmuring.

CAL'NO, our consumption, quite himself.

CAL'VARY, the place of a skull.

CA'MON, his resurrection.

CA'NAAN, zeal, possession, nest, cane.

CANAAN, Kay'-nan, a merchant, a trader. The son of Ham, who gave name to the land of Canaan.

CANAANITE, Kay'-nan-ite, an inhabitant of Canaan.

CANDACE, Kan-day'-se, who possesses contrition.

CAPERNAUM, Ka-per'-na-um, the field of repentance, city of comfort.

CAPHTOR, Kaf'-tor, a sphere, a buckle, a hand, doves, those that seek and inquire.

CAPPADOCIA, Kap-pa-do'-she-a, in Hebrew, Caph-tor.

CARCAS, Kar'-kas, the covering of a lamb.

CARCHEMISH, Kar'-ke-mish, a lamb, as taken away.

CAR'MEL, a circumcised lamb, harvest, vineyard of God.

CARMELITE, Kar'-me-lyte, an inhabitant of Mount Carmel.

CAR'MI, my vineyard, the knowledge or the lamb of the waters.

CAR'PUS, fruit, fruitful.

CASIPHIA, Ka-se-fy'-a, money, covetousness.

CAS'TOR, a beaver.

CEDRON, See'-dron, or Kee'-dron, black, sad.

CENCHREA, Senk'-re-a, millet, small pulse.

CEPHAS, See'-fas, or Kee'-fas, a rock or stone.

CE'SAR. See Cæsar.

CESAREA, Ses-a-ree'-a. See Cæsarea.

CHALCOL, Kal'-kol, who nourishes, sustains the whole.

CHALDEA, Kal-dee'-a, as demons, as robbers.

CHALDEAN, Kal-dee'-an, an inhabitant of Chaldea.

CHALDEES, Kal'-deez, the same as Chaldeans.

CHARRAN, Kar'-ran, a singing, the heat of wrath.

CHEBAR, Ke'-bar, strength or power.

CHEODORLAOMER, Ke'-dor-la-o'-mer, as a generation of servitude.

CHEMARIMS, Kem'-a-rims, the name of Baal's priests.

CHEMOSH, Ke'-mosh, as handling, as taking away.

CHENANIA, Ke-na-ny'-ah, preparation, rectitude of the Lord.

CHERETHIMS, Ker'-eth-ims, who cuts, tears away.

CHERETHITES, Ker'-eth-ites. See Cherethims.

CHEBITH, Ke'-rith, cutting, piercing, slaying.

CHESED, Ke'-sed, as a devil, a destroyer.

CHILEAB, Kil'-le-ab, totality or perfection of the father.

CHILION, Kil'-le-on, finished, complete.

CHILMAD, Kil'-mad, as teaching or learning.

CHIMHAM, Kim'-ham, as they, like to them.

CHIOS, Ky'-os, open, opening.

CHISLEU, Kis'-lu, rashness, confidence.

CHITTIM, Chit'-tim, [or Kit'-tim,] those that bruise, gold, staining.

CHIUN, Ky'-un, an Egyptian god, whom some think to be Saturn.
 CHLOE, Klo'e, green herb.
 CHORAZIN, Ko-ray'-zin, the secret, here is a mystery.
 CHUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, Kew'-shan-rish-a-thay'-im, Ethiopian, blackness of iniquities.
 CHUZA, Kew'-zah, the prophet, Ethiopian.
 CILICIA, Sil-ish'-e-a, which rolls or overturns.
 CLAUDA, Klaw'-dah, a broken voice, a lamentable voice.
 CLAUDIA, Klaw'-de-ah, lame.
 CLE'MENT, [or Clem'-ent,] mild, good, merciful.
 CLEOPHAS, Klee'-o-fas, the whole glory.
 COLOSSE, Ko-los'-see, punishment, correction.
 CONIAH, Ko-ny'-ah, the strength or stability of the Lord.
 CO'RINTH, which is satisfied, beauty.
 CORIN'THIANS, inhabitants of Corinth.
 CORNE'LIUS, a horn.
 COZ'BI, a liar, as sliding away.
 CRESCENS, Kres'-sens, growing, increasing.
 CRETE, Kree't, carnal, fleshly.
 CRETES, Kree'ts, inhabitants of Crete.
 CRETIAN, Kree'-she-ans, the same as Cretes.
 CRISPUS, Kris'pus, curled.
 CUSH, Ethiopian, black.
 CUSH'AN, Ethiopia, blackness, heat.
 CUSH'I, the same as Cushan.
 CYPRUS, Sy'-prus, fair, fairness.
 CYRENE, Sy-re'-ne, a wall, coldness, meeting, a floor.
 CYRENEANS, Sy-re'-ne-ans, people of Cyrene.
 CYRENIUS, Sy-re'-ne-us, who governs.
 CYRUS, Sy'-rus, as miserable, as heir, the belly.
 DABBASHETH, Dab'-ba-sheth, flowing with honey, causing infamy.
 DABERATH, Dab'-be-rath, word, thing, bee, submissive.
 DA'GON, corn, a fish.
 DALMANUTHA, Dal-ma-new'-thah, a bucket, leanness, branch.
 DALMATIA, Dal-may'-she-a, deceitful lamps, vain brightness.
 DAMARIS, Dam'-a-ris, a little woman.
 DAMAS'CUS, a sack full of blood, similitude of burning.
 DAN, judgment, he that judges.
 DAN'IEL, judgment of God.
 DA'RA, generation, house of the shepherd, companion, race of wickedness.
 DARIUS, Da-ry'-us, he that inquires and informs himself.
 DA'THAN, laws, rites.
 DA'VID, beloved, dear.
 DEB'ORAH, a word, a bee.
 DECAPOLIS, De-kap'-po-lis, a Greek word, compounded of déka, ten, and πόλις, a city, because this country contained ten cities.
 DE'DAN, their breasts, friendship, uncle.
 DEDANIM, Ded'-an-im, descendants of Dedan.
 DEL'ILAH, poor, head of hair, bucket.
 DE'MAS, popular.
 DEMETRIUS, De-me'-tre-us, belonging to Ceres, to corn.
 DER'BE, a sting.
 DEUEL, De-ew'-el, the knowledge of God.
 DIANA, Dy-ay'-nah, luminous, perfect.

DI'BON, understanding, abundance of building.
 DI'BON-GAD, abundance of sons, happy and powerful.
 DIDYMUS, Did'-e-mus, a twin.
 DI'MON, where it is red.
 DI'NAH, judgment, who judges.
 DIN'HABAH, she gives judgment.
 DIONYSIUS, Dy-o-nish'-e-us, divinely touched; from dios, divine, and νέω, I move.
 DIOTREPHES, Di-ot'-re-feez, nourished by Jupiter; from dios, of Jupiter, and τρέφω, a foster-child.
 DO'EG, who acts with uneasiness, a fisherman.
 DOR, generation, habitation.
 DOR'CAS, the female of a roe-buck.
 DO'THAN, the law, custom.
 DRUSILLA, Drew-sil'-lah, watered by the dew; from δρόσος, the dew.
 DUMAH, Dew'-mah, silence, resemblance.
 DURA, Dew'-rah, generation, habitation.
 EASTER, Ees'-ter, the passover, a feast of the Jews.
 E'BAL, a heap, collection of old age.
 E'BED, a servant or laborer.
 EBED-MELECH, Ee'-bed-me'-lek, the king's servant.
 EBEN-EZER, Eb-en-ee'-zer, the stone of help.
 E'BER, one that passes, anger, wrath.
 EBIASAPH, E-by'-a-saf, a father that gathers together.
 ED, witness.
 E'DEN, pleasure, delight.
 E'DOM, red, earthy, red earth.
 E'DOMITE, a descendant of Esau, of Edom.
 EDREI, Ed'-re-i, a very great mass, cloud, death of the wicked.
 EG'LAH, heifer, chariot, round.
 EGLAIM, Eg-lay'-im, drops of the sea.
 EG'LOH, the same as Eglah.
 E'GYPT, in Hebrew, Mizraim; that binds or straitens, that troubles or oppresses.
 EGYPTIAN, an inhabitant of Egypt.
 E'HUD, he that praises.
 EK'RON, barrenness, torn away.
 EK'RONITES, inhabitants of Ekron.
 E'LAH, an oak, oath, imprecation.
 E'LAM, a young man, a virgin, secret, an age.
 E'LAMITES, descendants of Elam.
 E'LATH, a hind, strength, an oak.
 EL-BETH'EL, the God of Bethel.
 EL'DAD, loved or favored of God.
 ELEALEH, El-e-ay'-leh, ascension or burnt-offering of God.
 ELEAZAR, El-e-ay'-zar, the help or court of God.
 EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL, El-el-ho'-he-is'-ra-el, God, the God of Israel.
 ELHA'NAN, grace, gift, or mercy of God.
 E'LI, E'LI, my God, my God.
 E'LI, the offering or lifting up.
 ELI'AB, God my father.
 ELIADA, El-ly'-a-da, or El-le-ay'-da, the knowledge of God.
 ELIAKIM, El-ly'-a-kim, the resurrection of God, God the avenger.
 ELI'AM, the people of God.
 ELI'AS. See Elijah.
 ELIASHIB, El-ly'-a-shib, the God of conversion.
 ELIATHAH, El-ly'-a-thah, thou art my God, my God comes.

- ELIEZER, E-le-ee'-zer, help or court of my God.
- ELIHOREPH, E-le-ho'-ref, the God of winter, of youth.
- ELI'HU, he is my God himself.
- ELI'JAH, God the Lord, the strong Lord.
- ELI'KA, pelican of God.
- E'LIM, the rams, the strong, the stags, the valleys.
- ELIMELECH, E-lim'-me-lek, my God is king.
- ELIOENAI, El-e-o'-en-a-i, toward him are my eyes, my fountains, toward him is my poverty or misery.
- ELIPHALET, E-lif'-fa-let, the God of deliverance.
- ELIPHAZ, E-ly'-faz, the endeavor of God.
- ELISABETH, E-liz'-a-beth, God hath sworn; the fulness of God.
- ELI'SHA, salvation of God.
- ELI'SHAH, son of Javan; it is God, God that gives help.
- ELISHAMAH, E-lish'-a-mah, God hearing.
- ELISHEBA, E-lish'-e-ba. See Elisabeth.
- ELISHUA, El-e-shew'-ah, God is my salvation.
- ELIUD, E-ly'-ud, God is my praise.
- ELI'ZUD, God is my strength, my rock.
- ELKA'NAH, God the jealous, the reed of God.
- ELMO'DAM, the God of measure, of the garment.
- ELNA'THAN, God has given.
- E'LOH, oak, grove, strong.
- E'LUL, cry, outcry.
- ELUZAI, E-lu'-za-i, God is my strength.
- ELYMAS, El'-e-mas, in Arabic, a magician.
- E'MIMS, fears of terrors, people.
- EMMAUS, Em-may'-us or Em'-ma-us, people despised.
- EM'MOR, an ass.
- E'NAM, a fountain or well, the eyes of them.
- EN'DOR, fountain or eye of generation.
- ENE'AS, laudable; from αἰνέω, "I praise."
- EN-EGLAIM, En-eg-lay'-im, the eye of the calves, of the chariots, of roundness.
- EN-GEI, En-ge'-dy, fountain of the goat, of happiness.
- EN-MISH'PAT, fountain of judgment.
- ENOCH, El'-nok, dedicated, disciplined, well regulated.
- ENON, El'-non, cloud, his fountain.
- ENOS, El'-nos, fallen man, subject to all kind of evil.
- EN-ROGEL, En-ro'-gel, the fuller's fountain.
- EN-SHEMESH, En-she'-mesh, fountain of the sun.
- EPAPHRAS, Ep'-pa-fras, covered with foam.
- EPAPHRODITUS, Ep'-paf-ro-dy'-tus, agreeable, handsome.
- EPENETUS, E-pe-nee'-tus, laudable, worthy of praise.
- EPHAI, El'-fah, weary, to fly as a bird.
- EPHES-DAMMIM, El'-fez-dam'-mim, the effusion or drop of blood.
- EPHESIANS, E-fee'-se-ans, the people of Ephesus.
- EPHESUS, El'-fe-sus, desirable, chief city of Asia Minor.
- EPHPHATHA, El'-fa-tha, be opened.
- EPHRAIM, El'-fra-im, that brings forth fruit or grows.
- E'PHRAIMITE, a descendant of Ephraim.
- EPHRATAH, El'-ray'-tah, abundance, bearing fruit.
- EPHRATH, El'-rath. See Ephratah.
- EPHRATHITE, El'-rath-ite, an inhabitant of Ephratah, or a descendant from Ephraim.
- EPHRON, El'-ron, dust.
- EPICUREANS, Ep-e-kew-re'-ans, who gives assistance; from the Greek ἐπικουρέω, I help.
- ER, watch, enemy.
- ERAS'TUS, lovely, amiable.
- E'RECH, length, health.
- ESAIAS, E-zay'-e-as. See Isaiah.
- ESAR-HADDON, El'-sar-had'-don, that binds, joy, or closes the point.
- E'SAU, he that does or finishes.
- E'SEK, contention.
- ESH-BA'AL, the fire of the idol.
- ESH'COL, a bunch of grapes.
- ESH'TAOL, Esh'-ta-ol, stout, strong woman.
- ESHTEMOA, Esh-te-mo'-a, which is heard, the bosom of a woman.
- ES'LI, near me, he that separates.
- ES'ROM, the dart of joy, division of the song.
- ESTHER, Ess'-ter, secret, hidden.
- E'TAM, their bird or covering.
- E'THAM, their strength or sign.
- E'THAN, strong, the gift of the island.
- ETHANIM, Eth'-an-im, strong, valiant.
- ETHBAAL, Eth-bay'-al, toward the idol, he that rules.
- ETHIOPIA, El-the-o'-pe-a, in Hebrew, Cush, blackness; in Greek it signifies heat, from αἶθω, I burn, and ὄψις, face.
- ETHIOPIANS, El-the-o'-pe-ans, Africans.
- EUBULUS, Yew'-bu-lus, a prudent counsellor.
- EUNICE, Yew-ny'-se, good victory.
- EUODIAS, Yew-o'-de-as, sweet scent.
- EUPHRATES, Yew-fray'-tes, that makes fruitful.
- EUROC'LYDON, the north-east wind.
- EUTYCHUS, Yew'-te-kus, happy, fortunate.
- EVE, living, enlivening.
- EVIL-MERODACH, El'-vil-me-ro'-dak, or mer'-o-dak, the fool of Merodach, despising the bitterness of the fool.
- EZEKIEL, E-zee'-ke-el, the strength of God.
- E'ZEL, going abroad, distillation.
- EZION-GEER, El'-ze-on-ge'-ber, the wood of the man, counsel of the man, of the strong.
- Ez'RA, a helper.
- FE'LIX, happy, prosperous.
- FES'TUS, festival, joyful.
- FORTUNA'TUS, happy, prosperous.
- GAAL, Gay'-al, contempt, abomination.
- GAASH, Gay'-ash, tempest, overthrow.
- GABBATHA, Gab'-ba-tha, high, elevated. In Greek, lithostrotos, paved with stones.
- GA'BRIEL, God is my strength.
- GAD, a band, happy, armed and prepared.
- GADARENES, Gad-a-ree'-ns, surrounded, walled.
- GAD'DI, my happiness, my troop, a kid.
- GADDIEL, Gad'-de-el, goat of God, the Lord is my army.
- GADITES, Gad'-dites, descendants of Gad.
- GAIUS, Gay'-e-us, lord, an earthly man.
- GALATIA, Gal'-ay'-she-a, white, of the color of milk.
- GALATIANS, Gal'-ay'-she-ans, born in Galatia.
- GALBANUM, Gal'-ba-num, a gum, sweet spice.
- GALEED, Gal'-e-ed, the heap of witness.
- GALILEE, Gal'-le-lee, wheel, revolution, heap.

GALILEANS, Gal-le-lee'-ans, inhabitants of Galilee.
 GAL'LIM, who heap up, cover, roll.
 GAL'TIO, he that sucks or lives upon milk.
 GAMA'LIEL, recompense, camel, weaned of God.
 GAM'MADIMS, soldiers placed in the towers of Tyrus; men who came from Gammade, a town of Phenicia.
 GA'TAM, their lowing, their touch.
 GATH, a press.
 GATH-RIM'MON, the press of the granite, exalted press.
 GA'ZA, strong, a goat.
 GE'BA, a hill, a cup.
 GE'BAL, bound, limit.
 GE'BIM, grasshoppers, height.
 GEDALIAH, Ged-a-ly'-ah, God is my greatness, fringe of the Lord.
 GEHAZI, Ge-hay'-zye, valley of sight, of the breast.
 GEMARI'AH, accomplishment of the Lord.
 GENNESARET, Gen-ness'-a-ret, or Jen-ness'-a-ret, the garden or protection of the prince.
 GENUBATH, Gen'-u-bath, theft, garden or protection of the daughter.
 GE'RA, pilgrimage, dispute.
 GE'RAH, the twentieth part of a shekel.
 GE'RAR. See Gera.
 GERSENESES, Ger'-ge-seens, those who come from pilgrimage or from fight.
 GERIZIM, Ger'-re-zim, cutters.
 GER'SHOM, a stranger there, a traveller of reputation.
 GER'SHON, his banishment, the change of pilgrimage.
 GE'SHUR, the sight of the valley, the vale of the ox or the wall.
 GESHURITES, Gesh'-u-rytes, inhabitants of Geshur.
 GE'THER, the vale of trial, of searching, the press of inquiry.
 GETHSEMANE, Geth-sem'-a-ne, a very fat valley.
 GIAH, Gy'-ah, to guide, draw out, a sigh.
 GIBEAH, Gib'-e-ah, a hill.
 GIB'EON, hill, cup, that which is without.
 GIB'EONITES, people of Gibeon.
 GID'EON, he that bruises, cutting off iniquity.
 GIHON, Gy'-hon, valley of grace, impetuous.
 GILBOAH, Gil'-bo-ah, revolution of inquiry.
 GILEAD, Gil'-le-ad, the mass of testimony.
 GILEADITES, Gil'-le-ad-ites, the inhabitants of Gilead.
 GIL'GAL, wheel, revolution, heap.
 GILOH, Gy'-loh, he that rejoices, overturns, or discovers.
 GILONITE, Gy'-lo-nite.
 GIRGASHITE, Gir'-ga-shite, who arrives from pilgrimage.
 GITTITE, Gil'-tite, a wine-press.
 GOB, cistern, grasshopper, eminence.
 GOG, roof, covering.
 GO'LAN, passage, revolution.
 GOL'GOTHA, a heap of skulls.
 GOLI'ATH, revolution, discovery, heap.
 GO'MER, to finish, accomplish, a consumer.
 GOMOR'RAH, a rebellious people.
 GO'SHEN, approaching, drawing near.
 GO'ZAN, fleece, pasture, nourishing the body.
 GRECIA, Gree'-she-a, Greece, the country of the Greeks.

GRECIANS, Gree'-she-ans, Greeks, the inhabitants of Greece.
 GUR, the young of a beast, dwelling, fear.
 GURBA'AL, the whelp of the governor.
 HABAKKUK, Hab'-a-kuk, he that embraces, a wrestler.
 HACHALIAH, Hak-a-ly'-ah, who waits for the Lord.
 HACHILAH, Hak'-e-lah, my trust is in her.
 HA'DAD, joy, noise.
 HADADEZER, Hay'-dad-ee'-zer, the beauty of assistance.
 HADAD-RIMMON, Hay'-dad-rim'-mon, the voice of height, the invocation of Rimmon, a god of the Syrians.
 HADAS'SAH, a myrtle, joy.
 HADO'RAM, their beauty, power, praise.
 HADRACH, Hay'-drak, point, joy of tenderness, your chamber.
 HA'GAR, a stranger, that fears.
 HAGARENES, Hay'-gar-eens, of the family of Hagar.
 HAGARITES, Hay'-gar-ites. See Hagarenes.
 HAGGAI, Hag'-ga-i, feast, solemnity.
 HAG'GITH, rejoicing.
 HAK'KATAN, little.
 HALLELUIAH, Hal-le-lu'-yah, praise the Lord.
 HAM, hot, brown.
 HA'MAN, noise, tumult, he that prepares.
 HA'MATH, anger, heat, a wall.
 HAMMEDATHA, Ham-med'-a-thah, or Ham-meday'-thah, he that troubles the law.
 HA'MON-GOG, the multitude of Gog.
 HA'MOR, an ass, clay, wine.
 HA'MUL, godly, merciful.
 HAMU'TAL, the shadow of his heat, the heat of the dew.
 HANAMEEL, Han-am'-e-el, or Han-am-ee'-el, grace or pity from God.
 HANANEEL, Han-an-ee'-el, mercy of God.
 HANANI, Han-ay'-ny, my grace or mercy.
 HANANI'AH, grace or mercy of the Lord.
 HAN'NAH, gracious, merciful, taking rest.
 HA'NOCH, dedicated.
 HA'NUN, gracious, merciful, he that rests.
 HA'RAH, mountainous country, which is enclosed.
 HARBO'NAH, his destruction or dryness.
 HA'ROD, astonishment, fear.
 HAROSHETH, Har'-o-sheth, agriculture, silence, vessel of earth, forest.
 HASHMO'NAH, diligence, enumeration, embassy, present.
 HA'TACH, he that strikes.
 HAVILAH, Hav'-e-lah, that suffers pain, brings forth, declares to her.
 HAVOTH-JAIR, Hay'-voth-jay'-ir, villages that enlighten.
 HAZAEL, Haz'-a-el, that sees God.
 HAZARMAVETH, Hay'-zar-may'-veth, court or dwelling of death.
 HAZELEPONI, Hay'-zel-el-po'-ny, shade, sorrow of the face.
 HAZEROTH, Haz-ee'-roth, villages, court.
 HA'ZOR, court, hay.
 HE'BER, one that passes, anger.
 HE'BREWS, descended from Heber.
 HE'BRON, society, friendship, enchantment.

HEGAI, or HEGE, Heg'-a-i, meditation, word, separation.

HE'LAM, their army, trouble, or expectation.

HEL'BON, milk, fatness.

HELDAI, Hel'-da-i, or Hel-day'-i, the world.

HE'LI, ascending, climbing up.

HEL'KATH-HAZ'URIM, the field of strong men, of rocks.

HE'MAN, their trouble, their tumult, much.

HEN, grace, quiet.

HEPHER, Hee'-fer, a digger or delver.

HEPHZI-BAH, Hef'-ze-bah, my pleasure.

HER'MES, Mercury, gain, refuge.

HERMOGENES, Her-moj'-e-nes, begotten of Mercury, of lucre.

HER'MON, anathema, destruction.

HER'MONITES, the inhabitants of Hermon.

HEROD, Her'-rod, the glory of the skin.

HERODIANS, He-ro'-de-ans.

HERO'DIAS, the wife of Herod.

HERODION, He-ro'-de-on, song of Juno.

HESH'BON, invention, industry, thought, he that hastens to understand.

HETH, trembling, fear.

HETH'LON, fearful dwelling, his covering.

HEZEKI'AH, strong in the Lord.

HEZ'RON, the dart of joy, division of the song.

HIDDAI, Hid'-da-i, praise, cry.

HIDDEKEL, Hid'-de-ke-l, a sharp voice.

HI'EL, the life of God.

HIERAPOLIS, Hy-er-ap'-po-lis, holy city.

HIGGAION, Hig-gay'-e-on, meditation.

HILKI'AH, God is my portion, the Lord's gentleness.

HIL'LEL, praising folly, Lucifer.

HIN'NOM, there they are, their riches.

HI'RAM, exaltation of life, their whiteness, he that destroys.

HIT'TITES, who are broken or fear.

HI'VITES, wicked, bad, wickedness.

HO'BAB, favored and beloved.

HO'BAH, love, friendship, secrecy.

HOG'LAH, his festival, his dance.

HOPHNI, Hoff'-ni, he that covers, my fist.

HOR, who conceives, shows.

HO'REB, desert, destruction, dryness.

HOR-HAGIDGAD, Hor-ha-gidd'-gad, hill of felicity.

HOR'MAH, devoted to God, destruction.

HORONAIM, Hor-o-nay'-im, anger, raging.

HORONITE, Hor'-o-nyte, anger, fury, liberty.

HOSEA, and HOSHEA, Ho-zeel'-a, and Ho-shee'-a, Saviour.

HUL, infirmity, bringing forth children.

HUL'DAH, the world, a prophetess.

HUR, liberty, whiteness, cavern.

HUSHAI, Hew'-sha-i, their haste, sensuality, or silence.

HUZ'ZAB, molten.

HYMENEUS, Hy-men-ee'-us, nuptial, marriage.

IB'HAR, election, he that is chosen.

ICHABOD, Ik'-a-bod, where is the glory?

ICONIUM, I-ko'-ne-um, from ikw, "I come."

ID'DO, his hand, power, praise, witness.

IDUMEA, Id-ew-mee'-a, red, earthy.

IGDALI'A, the greatness of the Lord.

I'JON, look, eye, fountain.

ILLYRICUM, Il-lir'-re-kum, joy, rejoicing.

IM'LAH, plenitude, repletion, circumcision.

IMMAN'UEL, a name given to our Lord Jesus Christ, signifying, God with us.

IM'RAH, a rebel, changing.

INDIA, In'-de-a, praise, law.

IPHEDEIAH, If-fe-dy'-ah, or If-fe-dee'-ah, the redemption of the Lord.

I'RA, city, watch, spoil, heap of vision.

I'RAD, wild ass, heap of descents, of empire.

IRIJAH, I-ry'-jah, the fear, vision, or protection of the Lord.

ISAAC, I'-zak, laughter.

ISAIAH, I-zay'-yah, or I-zay'-e-ah, the salvation of the Lord.

ISCAH, Is'-kah, he that anoints or covers.

ISCARIOT, Is-kar'-re-ot, is thought to signify a native of the town of Iscarioth.

ISH'BAK, empty, forsaken, abandoned.

ISHI-BENOB, Ish'-by-bee'-nob, he that sits in the prophecy, conversion.

ISH-BOSHETH, Ish'-bo-sheth, a man of shame.

ISHMAEL, Ish'-ma-el, God who hears.

ISHMAELITES, Ish'-ma-el-ites, the posterity of Ishmael.

ISRAEL, Is'-ra-el, a prince with God, prevailing with God, that wrestleth with God.

ISRAELITES, Is'-ra-el-ites, the posterity of Israel, or Jacob.

ISSACHAR, Is'-sa-kar, price, reward.

ITALIAN, I-tal'-e-an, belonging to Italy.

ITALY, It'-ta-le, a Latin word that has its original from vitulus, or vitula, "a calf," or from a king called Italus.

ITH'AMAR, island of the palm tree, woe to the palm or change.

ITHIEL, Ith'-e-el, God with me, sign.

ITHREAM, Ith'-re-am, excellence of the people.

ITUREA, It-u-ree'-a, which is guarded, a country of mountains.

I'VAH, iniquity.

JAALAM, Ja-ay'-lam, hidden, young man, kids.

JAAZANIA, Ja-az-a-ny'-ah, whom the Lord will hear, the balances, the arms.

JA'BAL, which glides away, produces.

JAB'BOK, evacuation, dissipation.

JA'BESH, dryness, confusion, shame.

JABESH-GILEAD, Jay'-besh-gil'-e-ad.

JA'BEZ, sorrow, trouble.

JA'BIN, he that understands, he that builds.

JABNEEL, Jab'-ne-el, building, or understanding of God.

JACHIN, Jay'-kin, that strengthens.

JA'COB, he that supplants, the heel.

JA'EL, he that ascends, a kid.

JAH, the everlasting God.

JA'HAZ, dispute, going out of the Lord.

JAHAZA, Ja-hay'-za, the same as Jahaz.

JAIR, Jay'-er, my light, who diffuses light.

JAIRUS, Jay'-e-rus, or Ja'-i'-rus, is enlightened.

JAM'BRES, the sea with poverty.

JAMES, the same as Jacob.

JAN'NA, who speaks, who answers, affliction.

JANNEZ, Jan'-nez, the same as Janna.

JAPHETH, Jay'-feth, persuades, handsome.

JAPHIA, Ja-fy'-ah, which enlightens, groans.

JA'REB, a revenger.

JA'RED, he that descends or commands.

JA'SHEER, righteous.

JA'SON, he that cures, that gives medicines.

JA'VAN, that deceives, clay.
 JA'ZER, assistance, he that helps.
 JE'BUS, treads under foot, contemns.
 JEB'USITES, inhabitants of Jebus.
 JECONI'AH, preparation or steadfastness of the Lord.
 JEDDI'EL, the knowledge or joy of God.
 JEDIDAH, Jed-dy'-dah, well-beloved, amiable.
 JEDIDIAH, Jed-e-dy'-ah, beloved of the Lord.
 JEDUTHUN, Jed-ew'-thun, or Jed'-ew-thun, his law, who gives praise.
 JEGAR-SAHADUTHA, Je'-gar-say-ha-dew'-tha, the heap of witnessing.
 JEHOAHAZ, Je-ho-ay'-haz, the prize or possession of the Lord.
 JEHO'ASH, the fire or victim of the Lord.
 JEHOIACHIN, Je-hoy'-a-kin, preparation or strength of the Lord.
 JEHOIADA, Je-hoy'-a-dah, knowledge of the Lord.
 JEHIOAKIM, Je-hoy'-a-kim, the resurrection of the Lord.
 JEHON'ADAB. See Jonadab.
 JEHO'RAM, exaltation, rejected of the Lord.
 JEHOSH'APHAT, God judges.
 JEHO'VAH, the incommunicable name of God, self-existing.
 JEHOVAH-JIREH, Je-ho'-vah-jy'-rey, the Lord will see or provide, will be manifested.
 JEHO'VAH-NIS'SI, the Lord my banner.
 JEHOVAH-SHALOM, Je-ho'-vah-shay'-lom, or shal'-lom, the Lord send peace.
 JEHO'VAH-SHAM'MAH, the Lord is there.
 JEHO'VAH-TSID'KENU, the Lord our righteousness.
 JEHU, Je'-hew, he that is or exists.
 JEHUDIAH, Je-hew-di'-jah, praise of the Lord.
 JEMI'MA, handsome as the day.
 JEPHTHAH, Jef'-thah, he that opens.
 JEPHUNNEH, Je-fun'-neh, he that beholds.
 JE'RAH, the moon, to scent or smell.
 JERAHMEEL, Je-ram'-me-el, mercy or love of God.
 JEREMI'AH, grandeur of the Lord.
 JERICOH, Jer'-re-ko, his moon, sweet smell.
 JERIMOTH, eminences, he that fears or rejects death.
 JEROBO'AM, fighting against, increasing the people.
 JERUBBAAL, Jer-ub-bay'-al, he that revenges the idol, let Baal defend his cause.
 JERUBBESHETH, Je-rub'-be-sheth, [or Je-rub-besh'-eth,] let the idol of confusion defend itself.
 JERU'SALEM, the vision or possession of peace.
 JERU'SHA, he that possesses the inheritance, exiled.
 JESHIMON, Jesh'-e-mon, solitude, desolation.
 JESHUA, Jesh'-u-a, a Saviour.
 JESHURUN, Jesh'-ew-run, upright.
 JES'SE, to be, my present.
 JESUI, Jes'-u-i, who is equal, flat country.
 JESUITES, Jes'-u-ites, the posterity of Jesui.
 JE'SUS, the holy name Jesus, Saviour, who saveth his people from their sins.
 JE'THER, he that excels, remains, searches.
 JETH'RO, his excellence or posterity.
 JE'TUR, he that keeps, succession, mountainous.
 JE'USH, devoured, gnawed by the moth.
 JEW, JEWS, so called from Judah.
 JEW'ESS, JEW'ISH, JEW'RY.

JEZ'EBEL, island of the habitation, woe to the habitation, isle of the dunghill.
 JEZRAHIAH, Jez-ra-hy'-ah, the Lord is the east. the Lord arises.
 JEZREEL, Jez'-re-el, or Jez-ree'-el, seed of God, dropping of the friendship of God.
 JEZREELITE, Jez'-re-el-ite, or Jez-ree'-el-ite, an inhabitant of Jezreel.
 JIDLAPH, Jid'-laf, he that distils, hands joined.
 JO'AB, paternity, having a father, voluntary.
 JO'AH, who has a brother, brother of the Lord.
 JOAN'NA, the grace of mercy of the Lord.
 JO'ASH, who despairs, burns, is on fire.
 JOB, he that weeps, cries, or speaks out of a hell-low place.
 JOCHEBED, Jok'-ke-bed, glorious, honorable, a person of merit, the glory of the Lord.
 JO'EL, that wills, commands, or swears.
 JOEZER, Jo-ee'-zer, he that aids.
 JO'HA, who enlivens and gives life.
 JOHA'NAN, who is liberal, and grants favor.
 JOHN, the gift or mercy of the Lord.
 JOK'SHAN, hard, difficult, scandalous.
 JOK'TAN, small, disgust, weariness, dispute.
 JON'ADAB, who acts in good earnest.
 JO'NAH, or JO'NAS, a dove, he that oppresses.
 JON'ATHAN, given of God.
 JOP'PA, beauty, comeliness.
 JO'RAM, to cast, elevated.
 JOR'DAN, the river of judgment, that rejects judgment, descent.
 JO'RIM, he that exalts the Lord.
 JO'SE, raised, who exists, or pardons, Saviour.
 JOSEPH, Jo'-sef, increase, addition.
 Joses, Jo'-sez. See Jose.
 JOSH'UA, the Lord, the Saviour.
 JOSI'AH, the fire of the Lord.
 JO'THAM, perfection of the Lord.
 JUBAL, Jew'-bal, he that runs, he that produces, a trumpet.
 JUBILEE, Jew'-be-lee, a feast of the Jews, every fiftieth year; in Hebrew, Jobel, a ram's horn, or a trumpet by which the jubilee year was proclaimed.
 JU'DAH, the praise of the Lord.
 JU'DAS, the same as Judah.
 JUDEA, Jew-dee'-a, a country.
 JU'LIA, downy; from loulos, "down."
 JU'LIUS, the same as Julia.
 JU'NIA, from Juno, or from juventus, youth.
 JUPITER, Jew'-pe-ter, as if it were juvans pater, the father that helpeth.
 JUS'TUS, just, upright.

KABZEEL, Kab'-ze-el, the congregation of God.
 KA'DESH, holiness.
 KADESH-BARNEA, Kay'-desh-bar'-ne-a, or bar-nee'-ah, holiness of an inconstant son, of the corn, of purity.
 KAD'MIEL, God of rising.
 KE'DAR, blackness, sorrow.
 KEDEMAH, Ked'-de-mah, oriental.
 KEDEMOTH, Ked'-de-moth, old age, orientals.
 KEILAH, Ky'-lah, she that divides or cuts.
 KEMUEL, Kem'-u-el, God is risen.
 KE'NAZ, this nest, lamentation, possession.
 KE'NITES, possession, lamentation, nest.
 KEREN-HAPPUCH, Kel'-ren-hap'-puk, the horn or child of beauty.

KERIOTH, Ke'-re-oth, the cities, the callings.
KETURAH, Ke-tew'-rah, he that burns or makes the incense to fume, odoriferous.
KEZLAH, Ke-zy'-ah, superficies, angle, cassia.
KE'ZIZ, end, extremity.
KIBROTH-HATTA'VAH, Kib'-roth-hat-tay'-a-vah, the graves of lust.
KID'RON, obscurity, obscure.
KIR, a city, a wall, a meeting.
KIR-HARASETH, Kir-har'-ra-seth, the city of the sun.
KIRIATHAIM, Kir'-e-ath-ay'-im, the two cities, the callings.
KIR'JATH, city, vocation, lesson, meeting.
KIR'JATH-AR'BA, the city of four.
KIR'JATH-A'RIM, city of cities, the city of those that watch.
KIR'JATH-BA'AL, the city of Baal, of those that command, of those that possess.
KIRJATH-JEARIM, Kir'-jath-je'-a-rim, the city of woods.
KIR'JATH-SAN'NAH, the city of the bush of enmity.
KIRJATH-SEPHER, Kir'-jath-see'-fer, the city of letters, of the book.
KISH, hard, difficult, straw.
KIS'RON, making sweet, perfuming.
KIT'TIM, they that bruise, gold, coloring.
KO'HATH, congregation, obedience, to make blunt.
KOHATHITES, Ko'-hath-ites, the posterity of Kohath.
KO'RAH, bald, frozen.

LA'BAN, white, shining, gentle.
LACHISH, Lay'-kish, she walks, who exists of himself.
LA'EL, to God, to the Almighty.
LAH'MI, my bread, my war.
LA'ISH, a lion.
LA'MECH, poor, made low, who is struck.
LAODICEA, Lay-o-de-see'-a, just people.
LAODICEANS, Lay-o-de-see'-ans, inhabitants of Laodicea.
LAPIDOTH, Lap'-pe-doth, enlightened, lamps.
LAZARUS, Laz'-za-rus, the help of God.
LE'AH, weary, tired.
LEB'ANON, white, incense.
LEBBEUS, Leb-bee'-us, a man of heart.
LEHABIM, Le'-ha-bim, or Le-hay'-bim, flames, the points of a sword.
LE'HI, jaw-bone.
LEM'UEL, God with them.
LE'VI, who is held and associated.
LE'VITES, the posterity of Levi.
LIB'NAH, LIB'NI, white, whiteness.
LIBYA, Lib'-e-a, in Hebrew, Lubim, the heart of the sea.
LIBYANS, Lib'-e-ans, the people of Libya.
LI'NUS, nets.
LO-AM'MI, not my people.
LO'IS, better.
LO-RUHAMAH, Lo-ru-hay'-mah, not having obtained mercy, not pitied.
LOT, wrapped up, myrrh, rosin.
LU'CAS, luminous.
LUCIFER, Lu'-se-fer, bringing light.
LUCIUS, Lu'-she-us, See Lucas.
LUD, maturity, generation.

LUKE. See Lucas.
LUZ, separation, departure.
LYCAONIA, Ly-ka-o'-ne-a, she-wolf.
LYD'DA, the name of a city.
LYS'NIAS, that drives away sorrow.
LYS'TRA, that dissolves or disperses.

MAACHAH, May'-a-kah, to squeeze.
MAASEIAH, Ma-a-sy'-ah, the work of the Lord.
MACEDONIA, Mas-se-do'-ni-a, adoration, prostration.
MACHIR, May'-kir, he that sells or knows.
MACHPELAH, Mak-pee'-lah, double.
MAGDALA, Mag'-da-lah, tower, greatness.
MAGDALENE, Mag'-da-le'-ne, tower, grand, elevated.
MA'GOG, roof, that dissolves.
MAGOR-MISSABIB, May'-gor-mis'-sa-bib, fear, round about.
MAHALALEEL, Ma-ha-la-lee'-el, he that praises God.
MAHALATH, May-hay'-lath, melodious song, infirmity.
MAHANAIM, Ma-ha-nay'-im, the two fields or armies.
MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, May'-er-shal'-al-hash'-baz, making speed to the spoil.
MAH'LAH, the same as Mahalath.
MAH'LOH, song, infirmity.
MAKKEDAH, Mak'-ke-dah, adoration, prostration.
MALCHAM, Mal'-kam, their king.
MALCHI-SHUA, Mal'-ke-shew'-ah, my king is a saviour.
MALCHUS, Mal'-kus, king or kingdom.
MAM'MON, riches.
MAM'RE, rebellious, bitter, that changes.
MANAEN, Man'-a-en, or Ma-nay'-en, a comforter, he that conducts them.
MANAS'SEH, forgetfulness, he that is forgotten.
MANEH, May'-neh, a species of money.
MANOAH, Ma-no'-ah, rest, a present.
MA'ON, house, crime.
MA'RA, bitterness.
MA'RAH, the same as Mara.
MAR'CUS, polite, shining.
MARK, the same as Marcus.
MARS-HILL', the place where the judges of Athens held their supreme council.
MAR'THA, who becomes bitter.
MAR'Y, exalted, bitterness of the sea, mistress of the sea.
MASREKAH, Mas'-re-kah, whistling, hissing.
MAS'SAH, temptation.
MA'TRI, rain, prison.
MAT'TAN, the reins, the death of them.
MATTATHIAS, Mat'-ta-ithy'-as, the gift of the Lord.
MAT'THAT, gift, he that gives.
MATTH'EW, given, a reward.
MATTHIAS, Ma-ithy'-as. See Mattathias.
MAZ'ZAROTH, the twelve signs.
ME'DAD, he that measures, the water of love.
ME'DAN, judgment, process, measure, covering.
MEDES, Mee'-ds, people of Media.
MEDIA, Mee'-de-a, measure, covering, abundance.
MEGIDDO, Me-gid'-do, that declares, his precious fruit.
MEGIDDON, Me-gid'-don, the same as Megiddo.
MEHETABEL, Me-het'-ta-bel, how good is God!

MEHUJAEI, Me-hu-jay'-el, who proclaims God, God that blots out.
 MELCHI, Mel'-ky, my king, my counsel.
 MELCHIZEDEK, Mel-kiz'-ze-dek, king of righteousness.
 MELITA, Me-ly'-ta, or Me-lee'-ta, [or Mel'-i-ta,] affording honey.
 MEMPHIS, Mem'-fis, by the mouth.
 MEMUCAN, Me-mew'-kan, impoverished, to prepare, certain, true.
 MENAHEM, Men'-na-hem, comforter, who conducts them.
 MENE, Mee'-ne, who reckons, who is counted.
 MEPHIBOSHETH, Me-fib'-bo-sheth, out of my mouth proceeds reproach.
 ME'RAB, he that fights, he that multiplies.
 MERARI, Me-ray'-ry, bitter, to provoke.
 MERCURIUS, a false god; from the Latin word mercari, "to buy or sell," because he presided over merchandise; in Greek, hermes, "orator," or "interpreter."
 MERIB-BAAL, Mer-ib'-ba-al, or Mer'-ib-bay'-al, rebellion, he that resists Baal, and strives against the idol.
 MERIBAH, Mer'-re-bah, dispute, quarrel.
 MERODACH, Mer'-ro-dak, bitter, contrition; in Syriac, the little lord.
 MERODACH-BALADAN, Mer'-ro-dak-bal'-la-dan or ba-lay'-dan, who creates contrition, the son of death, of thy vapor.
 ME'ROM, eminences, elevations.
 ME'ROZ, secret, leanness.
 MESHACH, Mee'-shak, that draws with force, that surrounds the waters.
 MESHECH, Mee'-shek, who is drawn by force, shut up, surrounded.
 MESHELEMLIAH, Mesh-el-e-my'-ah, peace, perfection, retribution of the Lord.
 MESOPOTAMIA, Mes-o-po-tay'-me-a, in Hebrew, Aram-naharaim, that is, "Syria of the two rivers." In Greek it also signifies "between two rivers;" from μέσος, "middle," and ποταμός, "river."
 MESSIAH, Mes-sy'-ah, anointed.
 ME'THEG-AM'MAH, the bride of bondage.
 METHUSAEI, Me-thew'-sa-el, who demands his death.
 METHUSELAH, Me-thew'-se-lah, he has sent his death.
 MI'CAH, poor, humble, who strikes, is there.
 MICAIAH, My-kay'-e-ah, who is like to God? the lowliness of God.
 MICHAEL, My'-ka-el, the same as Micaiah.
 MICHAIAH, My-kay'-e-ah, the same as Micaiah.
 MICHAL, My'-kal, who is it that has all? who is perfect?
 MICHASH, Mik'-mash, he that strikes, the poor taken away.
 MIDIAN, Mid'-de-an, judgment, measure, covering.
 MIDIANITES, Mid'-de-an-ites, people of Midian.
 MIG'DOL, a tower, greatness.
 MIG'RON, fear, a barn, from the throat.
 MIL'CAH, queen.
 MIL'COM, their king.
 MILETUM, My-lee'-tum, red, scarlet.
 MIL'LO, fulness, repletion.
 MIN'NI, disposed, reckoned.
 MIN'NITH, counted, prepared.

MIRIAM, Mir'-re-am, exalted, bitterness of the sea, mistress of the sea.
 MIRS'GAR, the high fort or rock.
 MISHAEL, Mish'-a-el, asked for, lent, God takes away.
 MISREPHOTH-MAIM, Mis'-re-foth-may'-im, the burnings of the waters, furnaces where metals are melted.
 MITYLENE, Mit-e-lee'-ne, purity, press.
 MI'ZAR, little.
 MIZ'PAH, a sentinel, speculation, that waits for.
 MIZ'PEH, the same as Mizpah.
 MIZRAIM, Miz-ray'-im, tribulations, in straits.
 MNASON, Miz'-son, a diligent seeker, betrothing, an exhorter.
 MO'AB, of the father.
 MOABITES, Mo'-ab-ites, the descendants of Moab.
 MOLADAH, Mol'-a-dah, or Mo-lay'-dah, birth, generation.
 MOLECH, Mo'-lek, king.
 MOLOCH, Mo'-lok, the same as Molech.
 MORDECAI, Mor'-de-kay, contrition, bitter bruising; in Syriac, pure myrrh.
 MORI'AH, bitterness or fear of the Lord.
 MOSERA, Mo-see'-ra, MOSEROTH, Mo-see'-roth, erudition, discipline, bond.
 MO'SES, taken out of the water.
 MU'SHI, he that touches, withdraws himself.
 MY'RA, from μύρω, I flow, pour out, weep.
 MYRIA, Mish'-e-a, criminal, abominable.
 NAAMAN, Na-ay'-man, [or Na'-a-man,] beautiful, agreeable, that prepares himself to motion.
 NAAMATHITE, Na-ay'-ma-thite, [or Na'-a-ma-thite,] of Naamath.
 NAASHON, Na-ash'-on, that foretells, serpent.
 NA'BAL, a fool, senseless.
 NA'BOTH, words, prophecies, fruits.
 NA'DAB, free and voluntary gift, prince.
 NAGGE, Nag-gee, brightness.
 NAHARAI, Na-har'-ra-i, or Na-ha-ray'-i, my nostrils, hoarse, hot.
 NAHASH, Nay'-hash, snake, one that foretells, brass.
 NA'HOR, hoarse, hot, angry.
 NAHSHON, Nay'-shon. See Naashon.
 NA'HUM, comforter, penitent, their guide.
 NA'IN, beauty, pleasantness.
 NAIOTH, Nay'-e-oth, beauties, habitations.
 NAOMI, Na'-o-my, [or Na-o-mi,] beautiful, agreeable.
 NAPHTSI, Nay'-fish, the soul, he that refreshes himself, that respire; in Syriac, that multiplies.
 NAPHTALI, Naf'-ta-ly, comparison, likeness, that fights.
 NARCISSUS, Nar-sis'-sus, astonishment.
 NA'THAN, who gives, or is given.
 NATHANAEI, Na-than'-yel, the gift of God.
 NATHAN-MELECH, Nay'-than-me'-lek, gift of the king.
 NA'UM. See Nahum.
 NAZARENE, Naz-a-ree'n, kept, flower.
 NAZARETH, Naz'-a-reth, separated, sanctified.
 NEAPOLIS, Ne-ap'-po-lis, new city.
 NEBAIOTH, Ne-bay'-yoth, prophecies, fruits.
 NE'BAT, that beholds.
 NE'BO, that speaks, prophecies, or fructifies

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, Neb-ew-kad-nez'-zar, tears and groans of judgment.
 NEBUZAR-ADAN, Neb-ew-zar'-ra-dan, fruits or prophecies of judgment, winnowed, spread.
 NECHO, Nee'-ko, lame, who was beaten.
 NEHEMIAMITE, Ne-hel'-a-myte, dreamer, vale, brook.
 NEHEMIAH, Ne-he-my'-ah, consolation, repentance, or rest of the Lord.
 NEHILOTH, Ne-hee'-loth, flute, hautboy, cornet.
 NEHUSHTA, Ne-hush'-tah, snake, soothsayer.
 NEHUSH'TAN, which is of brass or copper, a trifle of brass.
 NER, lamp, brightness, land new tilled.
 NEREUS, Nee'-re-us. See Ner.
 NERI, Nee'-ry, my light.
 NERI'AH, light and lamp of the Lord.
 NETHANEEL, Ne-than'-ne-el. See Nathanael.
 NETHANIA, Neth-a-ny'-ah, the gift of the Lord.
 NETHINIMS, Neth'-e-nims, given, offered.
 NIB'HAZ, that fructifies, to prophesy, to speak.
 NIGANOR, Ny-kay'-nor, a conqueror, victorious.
 NICODEMUS, Nik-o-dee'-mus, innocent blood; in Greek, the victory of the people.
 NICOLAITANS, Nik-o-lay'-e-ianz, the followers of Nicolas.
 NICOLAS, Nik'-o-las, victor of the people; from νίκη, I overcome, and λαός, the people.
 NICOPOLIS, Ny-kop'-po-lis, the city of victory.
 NIGER, Ny'-jer, black.
 NIM'RIM, leopard, rebellion, change.
 NIM'ROD, rebellious, sleep of descent.
 NIM'SHI, rescued from danger, that touches.
 NINEVEH, Nin'-ne-veh, agreeable dwelling.
 NINEVITES, Nin'-ne-vites, people of Nineveh.
 NI'SAN, banner; in Syriac, a miracle.
 NIS'ROCH, flight, standard, proof.
 No, a stirring up, a forbidding.
 NOADI'AH, witness of the Lord.
 NO'AH, repose, rest, consolation.
 NOB, discourse, prophecy.
 NO'BAH, that barks or yelps.
 NOD, vagabond.
 NOPH, Noff, honeycomb, a sieve, that drops.
 NUN, son, posterity, durable.
 NYMPHAS, Nim'-fas, spouse, bridegroom.

ORADI'AH, servant of the Lord.
 O'BAL, inconvenience of old age, of the flux.
 O'BED, a servant.
 O'BED-E'DOM, the servant of Edom, the Idumæan, laborer of the man.
 O'ELL, that weeps, deserves to be bewailed, ancient.
 OC'AN, disturber.
 O'DED, to sustain, to lift up.
 OG, a cake, bread baked in the ashes.
 O'HEL, tent, tabernacle, brightness.
 OLYMPAS, O-lim'-pas, heavenly.
 O'MAR, he that speaks, bitter.
 OMEGA, O-mee'-ga, the last letter of the Greek alphabet.
 OM'RI, a sheaf of corn, rebellion, bitter.
 ON, pain, force, iniquity.
 O'NAN, pain, strength, iniquity.
 ONESIMUS, O-nes'-se-mus, profitable, useful.
 ONESIPHORUS, On-ne-sif'-fo-rus, who brings profit.
 OPHEL, O'-fel, tower, obscurity.

OPHIR, O'-fir, ashes.
 OPHRAH, Off'-rah, dust, fawn, lead.
 O'REB, a raven, caution, evening.
 ORION, O-ry'-on, the name of a constellation.
 OR'NAN, that rejoices, their bow or ark.
 OR'PAH, the neck, skull, nakedness of the mouth.
 OTH'NI, my time, my hour.
 OTHNIEL, Oth'-ne-el, the hour of God.
 O'ZEM, that fasts, their eagerness.
 OZIAS, O-zy'-as, strength from the Lord.
 PAARAI, Pay'-a-ray or Pay-a'-ry, opening.
 PADAN-ARAM, Pay'-dan-ay'-ram, Padan, of the field, and Aram, Syria.
 PAGIEL, Pay-jel'-el, [or Pa'-gi-el,] prevention or prayer of God.
 PALESTINA, Pal-es-ty'-na, which is covered.
 PAL'TI, deliverance, flight.
 PAMPHYLIA, Pam-fil'-le-a, a nation made up of every tribe; from πᾶς, all, and φυλῆ, a tribe.
 PAPHOS, Pay'-fos, which boils, is very hot.
 PA'ARAN, beauty, glory, ornament.
 PAR'BAR, a gate or building belonging to the temple.
 PAR'MENAS, that abides and is permanent.
 PAROSH, Pay'-rosh, a flea, fruit of the moth.
 PARSHANDATHA, Par-shan'-a-tha, revelation of corporeal impurities, of his trouble.
 PARTHIANS, Par'-the-ans, horsemen.
 PARUAH, Pa-rew'-ah, flourishing, that flies away.
 PARVA'IM, supposed to be Peru or Ceylon.
 PASH'UR, that extends the hole, whiteness.
 PATARA, Pa-tay'-rah, [or Pat'-a-ra,] which is trodden under foot; from πατέω, I tread under foot.
 PATHROS, Path'-ros or Pay'-thros, mouthful of dew.
 PAT'MOS, mortal.
 PATROBAS, Pat'-ro-bas, [or Pat-ro'-bas,] paternal, that pursues the steps of his father.
 PAU, Pay'-ew, that cries aloud, appears.
 PAUL, PAUL'US, a worker. His former name was SAUL, a sepulchre, a destroyer.
 PEDAZUR, Ped-ah'-zur, saviour, strong and powerful, stone of redemption.
 PEDAIAH, Ped-ay'-e-ah, redemption of the Lord.
 PE'KAH, he that opens, or is at liberty.
 PEKAHIAH, Pek-a-hy'-ah, it is the Lord that opens.
 PE'KOD, noble, rulers.
 PELATI'AH, let the Lord deliver.
 PE'LEG, division.
 PELETHITES, Pe'-eth-ites, judges, destroyers.
 PENIEL, Pe-ny'-el, face or vision of God.
 PENIN'NAH, precious stone, his face.
 PENU'EL. See Peniel.
 PEOR, Pe'-or, hold, opening.
 PER'GA, very earthy.
 PER'GAMOS, height, elevation.
 PERIZZITES, Per'-iz-zytes, the name of a people who dwell in villages.
 PER'SIA, PER'SIS, that cuts, nail, horseman.
 PE'TEP, a rock, a stone.
 PETHU'EL, mouth or persuasion of God.
 PHALEG, Fay'-lek. See Peleg.
 PHALLU, Fal'-lu, admirable, hidden.
 PHALTI, Fal'-ty, deliverance, flight.
 PHANUEL, Fa-new'-el, face or vision of God.

PHARAOH, Fay'-ro, that disperses, that discovers; according to the Syriac, the revenger, the king, the crocodile.
 PHAREZ, Fay'-rez, division, rupture.
 PHARPAP, Far'-par, that produces fruits, fall of the bull.
 PHEBE, Fee'-be, shining, pure.
 PHENICE, Fe-ny'-se, red, purple.
 PHICHOL, Fy'-kol, the mouth of all, perfection.
 PHILADELPHIA, Fil-a-del'-fe-a, the love of a brother; from φιλία, love, and ἀδελφός, a brother.
 PHILEMON, Fil-ee'-mon or Fy-lee'-mon, that is affectionate.
 PHILETUS, Fil-ee'-tus or Fy-lee'-tus, amiable, beloved.
 PHIL'IP, warlike, a lover of horses.
 PHILIPPI, Fil-lip'-py, the same as Philip.
 PHILISTIA, Fil-lis'-te-a, or Fy-lis'-te-a, the country of the Philistines.
 PHILISTINES, Fil-lis'-tines, or Fil-lis'-tins, those that dwell in villages.
 PHILOLOGUS, Fil-lol'-lo-gus, lover of learning.
 PHINEHAS, Fin'-ne-has, a bold countenance.
 PHEGON, Fle'-gon, zealous, burning.
 PHRYGIA, Frij'-e-a, dry, barren.
 PHURAH, Few'-rah, that bears fruit, that grows.
 PHYCELLUS, Fy-gel'-lus, fugitive.
 PI-BE'SETH, the mouth of despite.
 PI-HAHIROTH, Py-ha-hy'-roth, the mouth, the pass of Hiroth, the opening of liberty.
 PI'LATE, who is armed with a dart.
 PI'NON, gem, that beholds.
 PIRATHON, Pir'-a-thon, his dissipation, deprivation; in Syriac, his vengeance.
 PIS'GAH, hill, eminence, fortress.
 PISIDIA, Py-sid'-e-a, pitch, pitchy.
 PI'SON, changing, doubling, extended.
 PI'THOM, their mouthful, bit, consumption.
 PI'THON, his mouth, his persuasion.
 POL'LUX, a boxer.
 PONTIUS, Pon'-she-us, marine, belonging to the sea.
 PON'TUS, the sea; from πόντος.
 PORATHA, Por'-a-tha, fruitful.
 PORCIUS, Por'-she-us.
 POTIPHAR, Pot'-te-far, bull of Africa, fat bull.
 POTI-PHERAH, Pot-iff'-fe-rah or Pot-e-fee'-rah, that scatters or demolishes the fat.
 PRISCA, Pris'-kah, ancient.
 PRISCILLA, Pris-sil'-lah, the same as Prisca.
 PROCHORUS, Prok'-o-rus, he that presides over the choirs.
 PUBLIUS, Pub'-le-us, common.
 PUDENS, Pew'-dens, shamefaced.
 PUL, bean, destruction.
 PU'NON, precious stone, that beholds.
 PUR, lot.
 PUTEOLI, Pew-tee'-o-ly, a city in Campania.
 PUTIEL, Pew'-te-el, God is my fatness.

QUAR'TUS, the fourth.

RAAMAH, Ray'-a-mah or Ra-ay'-mah, greatness, thunder, evil, bruising.
 RAAMESSES, Ra-am'-ses. See Rameses.
 RAB'BAH, powerful, contentious.
 RAB'MAG, who overthrows a multitude, chief of the magicians.
 RAB'SARIS, grand master of the eunuchs.

RAB'-SHAKEH, cup-bearer of the prince, chamberlain.
 RACHAB, Ray'-kab, proud, strong, enlarged.
 RACHAB, Ray'-kal, injurious, perfumer.
 RACHEL, Ray'-tshel, a sheep.
 RAGAU, Ray'-gaw, a friend, a neighbor.
 RAGUEL, [Rag'-u-el, or] Rag-ew'-el, shepherd or friend of God.
 RA'HAB, proud, strong, quarrelsome.
 RA'HAB, large, extended, public place.
 RAK'KATH, empty, spittle.
 RAK'KON, vain, mountain of lamentations.
 RAM, elevated, who rejects.
 RAMAH, Ray'-mah, the same as Ram.
 RATH, Ray'-math, raised, lofty.
 RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM, Ra-math-ay'-im-ze'-fim, the same as Ramah.
 RA'MATH-LE'HI, elevation of the jaw-bone.
 RAMESSES, Ram'-e-ses, thunder, he that destroys evil.
 RAMIAH, Ram-i'-ah, exaltation of the Lord.
 RA'MOTH, high places.
 RAPHA, Ray'-fa, relaxation, physic.
 RAPHAEL, [Ray'-fay-el, or] Ray-fay'-el. See Raphael.
 RAPHU, Ray'-few, cured, comforted.
 RE'BA, the fourth, a square, that stoops.
 REBEK'AH, fat, quarrel appeased.
 RECHAB, Re'-kab, square, chariot, rider.
 RECHABITES, Re'-kab-ites, the posterity of Rechab.
 REGEM, Re'-jem, [or Re'-gem,] that stones, purple.
 REGEM-MELECH, Re-jem'-me-lek, [or Re'-gem-me'lek,] he that stones the king, the purple of the king.
 REHAB'AH, breadth, place of the Lord.
 RE'HOB, breadth, extent.
 REHOB'AM, who sets the people at liberty, space of the people.
 REH'OBTH, spaces, places.
 RE'HUM, compassionate, friendly.
 RE'I, my shepherd, companion, my evil.
 REMAL'AH, the exaltation of the Lord.
 REM'MON, greatness, a pomegranate tree.
 REMPHAN, Rem'-fan, the name of an idol, which some think to be Saturn.
 REPHAEL, Re'-fa-el, the medicine of God.
 REPHAIM, REPHAIMS, Re-fay'-im, giant, physician, relaxed.
 REPHIDIM, Ref'-e-dim, beds, places of rest.
 RESIN, Ree'-sen, a bridle or bit.
 REU, Ree'-ew, his friend, his shepherd.
 REUBEN, Rew'-ben, who sees the son, vision of the son.
 REU'BENITES, the posterity of Reuben.
 REUEL, Re-yew'-el, shepherd or friend of God.
 REUMAH, Re-yew'-mah, lofty, sublime.
 REZEPH, Ree'-zeff, a pavement, burning coal.
 RE'ZIN, voluntary, runner.
 REZON, lean, secret, prince.
 RHEGIUM, Ree'-je-um, rupture, fracture.
 RHESA, Ree'-sah, will, course.
 RHODA, Ro'-dah, a rose.
 RHODES, Rodes, the same as Rhoda.
 RIB'LAH, quarrel that increases or spreads.
 RIM'MON, exalted, pomegranate.
 RIPHATH, Ry'-fath, remedy, release.
 RIS'SAH, watering, distillation, dew.

RIZ'PAH, bed, extension, coal.
 ROGEL, [Ro'-gel, or] Ro'-jel, a foot; in Syriac, custom.
 ROMANTI-EZER, Ro-mam'-te-ee'-zer, exultation of help.
 RO'MAN, strong, powerful.
 ROME, strength, power; from pōun.
 ROSH, the head, the beginning.
 RU'FUS, red.
 RUHAMAH, Ru-hay'-mah, having obtained mercy.
 RU'MAH, exalted, rejected.
 RUTH, filled, satisfied.

SABE'ANS, captivity, conversion, old age.
 SABTECHA, Sab'-te-kah, that surrounds.
 SA'DOC, just, justified.
 SA'LAH, mission, dart; according to the Syriac, that spoils.
 SALAMIS, Sal'-la-mis, shaken, tossed, beaten.
 SALATHIEL, Sal-ay'-the-el, I have asked of God.
 SA'LEM, complete, peace.
 SA'LIM. See Shalim.
 SAL'MON, peaceable, perfect, that rewards.
 SALMONE, Sal-mo'-ne, peaceable.
 SALOME, Sal-lo'-me. See Salmon.
 SAMARIA, Sa-may'-re-a, his guard, prison, or diamond; in Hebrew, Shomeron.
 SAMAR'ITANS, people of Samaria.
 SAM'LAH, raiment, his left hand, his name.
 SA'MOS, full of gravel.
 SAMOTHRACIA, Sam-o-thray'-she-a, an island so called because it was peopled by Samians and Thracians.
 SAM'SON, his sun; according to the Syriac, his service, here the second time.
 SAM'UEL, heard or asked of God.
 SANBAL'LAT, bush or enemy in secret.
 SAPH, Saff, rushes, end, threshold.
 SAPHIR, Saf'-fir or Say'-fir, a city.
 SAPPHIRA, Saf-fy'-rah, that tells, that writes books.
 SA'RAH, lady princess of the multitude.
 SARAI, Say'-ray, my lady, my princess.
 SAR'DIS, prince or song of joy, what remains; in Syriac, a pot or kettle.
 SAREP'TA, a goldsmith's shop, where metals used to be melted and tried.
 SAR'GON, who takes away protection, who takes away the garden; according to the Syriac, net, snares.
 SA'RON. See Sharon.
 SARSECHIM, Sar-see'-kim, master of the wardrobe, of the perfumes.
 SARUCH, Say'-ruk, branch, layer, twining.
 SA'TAN, contrary, adversary, an accuser.
 SAUL, demanded, sepulchre, destroyer.
 SCEVA, See'-vah, disposed, prepared.
 SCYTHIAN, Sith'-e-an, tanner, leather-dresser.
 SE'BA, drunkard, that surrounds; according to the Syriac, old man.
 SE'BAT, twig, sceptre, tribe.
 SE'CUNDUS, the second.
 SE'GUB, fortified, raised.
 SEIR, See'-er, hairy, demon, tempest, barley.
 SE'LAH, a rock.
 SELEUCIA, Se-lew'-she-a, beaten by waves, runs as a river.
 SEMEI, Sem'-me-i, or Se-mee'-i, hearing, obeying.
 SE'NEH, bush.

SE'NIR, a sleeping candle, a changing.
 SENNACHERIB, Sen-nak'-ke-rib, bush of the destruction of the sword, of drought.
 SEPHAR, See'-far, a book, scribe; in Syriac, a haven.
 SEPHARAD, See-fay'-rad, a book, descending, ruling.
 SEPHARVAIM, Sef-ar-vay'-im, two books, two scribes.
 SE'RAH, lady of scent, song, the morning.
 SERAIAH, Se-ra-i'-ah or Se-ray'-yah, prince of the Lord.
 SERGIUS, Ser'-je-us, a net.
 SE'RUG. See Saruch.
 SETH, put, who puts.
 SHAALBIM, Shay'-ab'-im, that beholds the heart.
 SHAARAIM, Shay'-a-ray'-im, gates, valuation, hairs, barley, tempests, demons.
 SHAASHGAZ, Shay'-ash'-gaz, he that presses the fleece.
 SHADRACH, Shay'-drak, tender nipple, tender field.
 SHA'LIM, fox, fist, path.
 SHALISHA, Shal'-e-shah, three, the third, prince.
 SHAL'LECHETH, [Shal'-le-keth], a casting out.
 SHAL'LUM, perfect, peaceable.
 SHAL'MAN, peaceable, perfect, that rewards.
 SHALMANESER, Shal-ma-nee'-zer, peace tied, perfection and retribution.
 SHAM'GAR, named a stranger, he is here a stranger, surprise of the stranger.
 SHAM'HUTH, desolation, astonishment.
 SHA'MIR, prison, bush, less.
 SHAM'MAH, loss, desolation, astonishment.
 SHAMMUAH, Sham'-mew-ah, [or Sham-mew'-ah], that is heard or obeyed.
 SHAPHAN, Shay'-fan, a rabbit, wild rat, their lip.
 SHAPHAT, Shay'-fat, a judge.
 SHARAI, Shar'-a-i or Sha-ray'-i, my lord, my song.
 SHAREZER, Shar-ee'-zer, overseer of the treasury.
 SHA'RON, his plain, field, song.
 SHA'SHAK, a bag of linen, the sixth bag.
 SHA'VEH, the plain, that makes equality.
 SHEALTIEL, She-al'-te-el, I have asked of God.
 SHEARIAH, She-a-ry'-ah, gate or tempest of the Lord.
 SHE'AR-JA'SHUB, the remnant shall return.
 SHE'BA, captivity, compassing about, repose, old age.
 SHEBANIAH, Sheb-a-ny'-ah, the Lord that converts, that recalls from captivity, that understands.
 SHEB'NA, who rests himself, who is now captive.
 SHECHEM, Shee'-kem, portion, the back, shoulders.
 SHEDEUR, Shee'-de-ur, or Shed'-e-ur, field, destroyer of fire.
 SHE'LAH, that breaks, that undresses.
 SHELEMIAS, Shel-le-my'-ah, God is my perfection, my happiness.
 SHELEPH, Shee'-lef, who draws out.
 SHEL'OMITH, my happiness, my recompense.
 SHELUMIEL, Shel-ew-my'-el, [or She-lew'-me-el], happiness, retribution of God.
 SHEM, name, renown, he that places.
 SHEMAIAH, She-ma-i'-ah or Shem-ay'-yah, that obeys the Lord.
 SHEMARIAH, Shem-a-ry'-ah, God is my guard, diamond.

SHEMEBER, Shem'-me-ber, name of force, fame of the strong.
 SHEMER, Shee'-mer, guardian, thorn.
 SHEMIDA, She-my'-dah, name of knowledge, that puts knowledge, the science of the heavens.
 SHEMINITH, Shem'-me-nith, the eighth.
 SHEMIRAMOTH, She-mir'-ra-moth, the height of the heavens, the elevation of the name.
 SHEN, tooth, change, he that sleeps.
 SHENIE, Shee'-nir, lantern, light that sleeps, he that shows.
 SHEPHATIAH, Shef'-a-ty'-ah, the Lord that judges.
 SHESHACH, Shee'-shak, bag of flax, the sixth bag.
 SHESHBAZZAR, Shesh-baz'-zar, joy in tribulation, or of vintage.
 SHETH. See Seth.
 SHETHER-BOZNAI, Shee'-ther-boz'-na-i, that makes to rot and corrupt.
 SHE'VA, vanity, elevation, fame, tumult.
 SHIBBOLETH, Shib'-bo-leth, burden, ear of corn.
 SHICRON, Shy'-kron, drunkenness, his wages.
 SHIGGAION, Shig-gay'-yon, a song of trouble.
 SHIGIONOTH, Shig-gy'-on-oth, mournful music.
 SHILOAH, Shy'-lo'-ah. See Siloah.
 SHI'LOH, sent, the apostle.
 SHI'LOH, peace, abundance.
 SHILONITE, Shy'-lo-nyte, of the city of Shiloh.
 SHIMEAH, Shim'-me-ah, that hears, that obeys.
 SHIMEI, Shim'-me-i, that hears, name of the heap, my reputation.
 SHIMSHAI, Shim'-shay, my sun.
 SHINAR, Shy'-nar, the watching of him that sleeps, change of the city.
 SHIPHRAH, Shif'-rah, handsome, trumpet, that does good.
 SHI'SHAK, present of the bag, of the pot, of the thigh.
 SHIT'TIM, that turn away, scourges, rods.
 SHO'A, tyrants.
 SHO'BAB, returned, turned back.
 SHO'BACH, your bonds, your nets, his captivity; according to the Syriac, a dove-house.
 SHOCHOH, Sho'-koh, defence, a bough.
 SHOSHAN'NIM, lilies of the testimony.
 SHU'AH, pit, humiliation, meditation.
 SHU'AL, fox, hand, fist, traces, way.
 SHU'HITE, a descendant of Shuah.
 SHU'LAMITE, peaceable, perfect, that recompenses.
 SHU'NAMITE, a native of Shunem.
 SHU'NEM, their change, their sleep.
 SHUR, wall, ox.
 SHU'SHAN, lily, rose, joy.
 SHU'THELAH, plant, verdure, moist pot.
 SIB'MAH, conversion, captivity, old age, rest.
 SICHEM, Sy'-kem. See Shechem.
 SI'DON, hunting, fishing, venison.
 SIGIONOTH, Sig-gy'-o-noth, according to variable tunes.
 SI'HON, rooting out, conclusion.
 SI'HOR, black, trouble, early in the morn.
 SI'LAS, three, the third.
 SILOAM, Sil'-o-am or Sy-lo'-am, sent, dart, branch.
 SILOAS, Sil'-o-as or Sy-lo'-as, the same as Siloam.
 SILOE, Sil'-o-e or Sy-lo'-e, the same as Siloas.
 SILV'ANUS, one who loves the woods.
 SIM'EON, that hears or obeys.
 SI'MON, that hears or obeys.

SIN, bush.
 SINAI, Sy'-nay, or Sy'-nay-i, bush; according to the Syriac, enmity.
 SI'NIM, the south country.
 SI'ON, noise, tumult.
 SI'RAH, turning aside, rebellion.
 SIRION, Sir'-re-on, a breastplate, deliverance.
 SISERA, Sis'-se-rah, that sees a horse or swallow.
 SI'VAN, bush, thorn.
 SMYR'NA, myrrh.
 SO, a measure for grain or dry matters.
 SO'COH, tents, tabernacles.
 SO'DI, my secret.
 SODOM, Sod'-dom, their secret, their lime, their cement.
 SODOMITES, Sod'-dom-ites, inhabitants of Sodom.
 SOL'OMON, peaceable, perfect, one who recompenses.
 SOPATER, So-pay'-ter, [or Sop'-a-ter,] who defends or saves his father.
 SO'REK, hissing, a color inclining to yellow.
 SOSIPATER, So-se-pay'-ter. See Sopater.
 SOSTHENES, Sos'-the-nes, a strong and powerful saviour.
 SPAIN, rare, precious.
 STACHYS, Stay'-kis, spike; from στάχυς.
 STEPHANAS, Stef'-fa-nas, a crown, crowned.
 STE'PHEN, the same as Stephanas.
 SUO'COTH, tents, tabernacles.
 SUO'COTH-BE'NOTH, the tabernacles of young women.
 SUK'KIMS, covered, shadowed.
 SUR, that withdraws or departs.
 SUSAN'NA, a lily, a rose, joy.
 SUSI, Su'-sy, horse, swallow, moth.
 SYCHAR, Sy'-kar, the name of a city.
 SYENE, Sy-ee'-ne, bush; according to the Syriac, enmity.
 SYNTYCHE, Sin'-te-ke, that speaks or discourses.
 SYRACUSE, Sir'-ra-keuse, that draws violently.
 SYRIA, Sir'-re-a, in Hebrew, Aram, sublime, deceiving.
 SYRIAC, SYRIAN, Sir'-re-ak, Sir'-re-an, of Syria.
 SYRIANS, Sir'-re-ans, inhabitants of Syria.
 SYRO-PHENICIAN, Sy'-ro-fe-nish'-e-an, purple, drawn to; from σῦρα, I draw, and φοινίξ, red palm tree.
 TAANACH, Tay'-a-nak or Ta-ay'-nak, who humbles or answers thee.
 TAB'BATH, good, goodness.
 TABEAL, Tay'-be-al or Tab-ee'-al, good God.
 TABEL, Tay'-be-el or Tab-ee'-el, the same as Tabeal.
 TABERAH, Tab'-b-rah, or Tab-ee'-rah, burning.
 TABITHA, Tab'-e-tha, in Syriac, clear-sighted; she is also called Dorcas, wild goat.
 TA'BOR, choice; in Syriac, contrition.
 TABRIMON, Tab'-re-mon, good pomegranate.
 TAD'MOR, palm tree, change.
 TAHAPANES, Ta-hap'-pa-nes, secret temptation.
 TAHPENES, Tah'-pe-nes, standard, flight.
 TALITHA-CUMI, Tal'-le-tha-kew'-my, young woman, arise.
 TALMAI, Tal'-may, my furrow, heap of waters.
 TA'MAR, a palm, palm tree.
 TAM'MUZ, abstruse, concealed.
 TANHUMETH, Tan-hew'-meth or Tan'-hu-rath, consolation, repentance.

TAPHATH, Tay'-fath, little girl.
 TAR'PELITES, ravishers, wearied.
 TAR'SHISH, contemplation of the marble.
 TAR'SUS, winged, feathered.
 TAR'TAK, chained, bound, shut up.
 TAR'TAN, that searches the gift of the turtle.
 TATNAI, Tat'-nay, that gives.
 TE'BAH, murder, a cook.
 TE'BETH, the Babylonish name of the tenth month of the Hebrews.
 TE'KEE, weight.
 TEKOA, Te-ko'-ah, sound of the trumpet.
 TEL'ABID, a heap of new grain.
 TEL'HARSA, Tel-har'-eah, heap, suspension of the plough or of the head.
 TE'LIETH, goodness.
 TEL'MELAH, Tel-me-lah, or Tel-mee'-lah, heap of salt or of mariners.
 TE'MA, admiration, perfection.
 TE'MAN, the south, Africa.
 TE'MANITE, an inhabitant of Teman.
 TE'RAH, to breathe, to scent, to blow.
 TERAPHIM, Ter'-a-fim, an image, an idol.
 TERTIUS, Ter'-she-us, the third.
 TERTUL'LUS, a liar, an impostor.
 TETRARCH, Tel'-rark or Tes'-trarch, governor of a fourth part of a kingdom.
 THADDEUS, Thad-dee'-us, that praises.
 THA'HASH, that makes haste, or keeps silence.
 THA'MAH, that blots out or suppresses.
 THA'MAR. See Tamar.
 THAM'MUZ. See Tammuz.
 THE'BEZ, muddy, silk.
 THELASAR, The-lass'-ar, that unbinds and grants the suspension or heap.
 THEOPHILUS, The-of'-fe-lus, a friend of God.
 THESSALONICA, Thes-sa-lo-ny'-kah, victory against the Thessalians.
 THEUDAS, Thew'-das, a false teacher.
 THOMAS, Tom'-mas, a twin.
 THUM'MIM, truth, perfection.
 THYATIRA, Thy-a-ty'-rah, a sweet savor of labor, or sacrifice of contrition.
 TIBERIAS, Ti-bee'-re-as, good vision.
 TIBERIUS, Ti-bee'-re-us, son of Tiber.
 TIB'NI, straw, understanding.
 TI'DAL, that breaks the yoke.
 TIGLATH-PILESER, Tig'-lath-pi-lee'-zer, that takes away captivity, miraculous.
 TIK'VAH, hope, a congregation.
 TIMEUS, Ti-mee'-us, in Greek, perfect, honorable; in Hebrew, admirable.
 TIM'NATH, image, enumeration.
 TIMNATH-HERES, Tim'-nath-hee'-res, image of the dumb.
 TR'MON, honorable.
 TIMO'THEUS, honor of God, valued of God.
 TIPHSAH, Tyf'-sah, passage, passover.
 TIRHAKAH, Tir-hay'-kah, or Tir'-ha-kah, inquirer, law made dull.
 TIRSHATHA, Tir-shay'-tha, [or Tir'-sha-tha,] that overturns the foundation; in Syriac, that beholds the time.
 TIR'ZAH, benevolent, pleasant.
 TISH'BITE, that makes captives, that dwells.
 TIR'US, honorable; from rio, I honor.
 TO'AH, a weapon.
 TOB, good, goodness.
 TOB-ADONIAH, Tob'-ad-o-ny'-jah, my good God.

TOBI'AH, the Lord is good.
 TOGAR'MAH, which is all bone, strong.
 TO'HU, that lives or declares.
 TOI, To'-i, who wanders.
 TO'LA, worm, scarlet.
 TO'LAD, nativity.
 TOPHEL, To'-fel, ruin, folly, insipid.
 TOPHET, To'-fet, a drum, betraying.
 TRO'AS, penetrated.
 TROGYLLIUM, Tro-jil'-le-um, a city in the isle of Samos.
 TROPHIMUS, Trof'-fe-mus, well educated.
 TRYPHENA, Try-fee'-nah, delicate.
 TRYPHO'SA, thrice shining.
 TU'BAL, the earth, confusion.
 TU'BAL-CAL'N, worldly possession, jealous of confusion.
 TYCHICUS, Tik'-e-cus, casual, happening.
 TYRAN'NUS, a prince, one that reigns.
 TYRE, TY'RUS, in Hebrew, Sor, or Tzur, strength.

UCAL, Yew'-kal, power, prevalency.
 ULAI, Yew'-la-i, or Yew-lay', strength.
 ULAM, Yew'-lam, the porch, their strength.
 UL'LA, elevation, holocaust, leaf.
 UN'NI, poor, afflicted.
 UPHAZ, Yew'-faz, gold of Phasis or Pison.
 UR, fire, light.
 URBA'NUS, civil, courteous.
 URI, Yew'-ry, my light or fire.
 URIAH, Yew-ry'-ah, the Lord is my light or fire.
 URIJAH, Yew-ry'-jah, the same as Uriah.
 URI'EL, God is my light or fire.
 URIM and THUMMIM, Yew'-rim, and Thum'-mim, lights and perfection.
 UZ, counsel; in Syriac, to fix.
 UZ'ZAH, strength, a goat.
 UZZEN-SHERAH, Uz'-zen-shee'-rah, ear of the flesh or of the parent.
 UZ'ZI, my strength, my kid.
 UZZI'AH, the strength of the Lord.
 UZZI'EL, the strength of God.
 UZZIELITES, Uz-zy'-el-ites, the posterity of Uzziel.

VASH'NI, the second.
 VASH'TI, that drinks, thread.
 VOPHSI, Vof'-sy, fragment, diminution.

ZAANA'NIM, movings.
 ZA'BAD, a dowry.
 ZAB'DI, portion, dowry.
 ZACCHEUS, Zak-kee'-us, pure, justified.
 ZACHARI'AH, memory of the Lord.
 ZA'DOK, just, justified.
 ZA'HAM, crime, impurity.
 ZAIR, Zay'-ir, little, afflicted.
 ZAL'MON, his shade, obscurity.
 ZALMO'NAH, the shade, your image.
 ZALMUN'NA, shadow, image.
 ZAMZUM'MIMS, thinking, wickedness.
 ZANO'AH, forgetfulness, this rest.
 ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH, Zaf'-nath-pa-a-nee'-ah, one that discovers hidden things; in the Egyptian tongue, a saviour of the world.
 ZA'RAH, east, brightness.
 ZAREPHATH, Zar'-re-fath, ambush of the mouth.
 ZARE'TAN, tribulation, perplexity.
 ZA'ZA, belonging to all; in Syriac, going back.
 ZEBADI'AH, portion of the Lord.

ZE'BAH, victim, immolation.
 ZEB'EDEE, abundant portion.
 ZEBO'IM, deer, goats.
 ZE'BUL, a habitation.
 ZEB'ULUN, dwelling, habitation.
 ZECHARI'AH. See Zachariah.
 ZE'DAD, his side, his hunting.
 ZEDEKI'AH, the Lord is my justice.
 ZEEB, Zee'-eb, wolf.
 ZE'LEK, the noise of him that licks or laps.
 ZELOPHEHAD, Ze-lo'-fe-ad, the shade or tingling of fear.
 ZELOTES, Ze-lo'-tes, jealous, full of zeal.
 ZEL'ZAH, noontide.
 ZE'NAS, living.
 ZEPHANI'AH, the Lord is my secret, the mouth of the Lord.
 ZEPHATH, Zee'-fath, which beholds, attends.
 ZE'PHO, that sees and observes.
 ZEE, perplexity, tribulation, a rock.
 ZE'RAH. See Zarah.
 ZEREDAH, Zer'-e-dah or Ze-ree'-dah, ambush.
 ZE'RESH, misery, stranger.
 ZE'ROR, root, that straitens, a stone.
 ZERU'AH, leprous, hornet.
 ZERUBBABEL, Ze-rub'-ba-bel, banished, a stranger at Babylon, dispersion of confusion.
 ZERUIAH, Zer-ew-i'-ah, pain, tribulation.
 ZE'THAN, their olive.
 ZE'THAR, he that examines or beholds.
 ZI'BA, army, fight, strength, stag.
 ZIB'EON, iniquity that dwells, the seventh.
 ZIB'IAH, deer, goat, honorable and fine.
 ZICHRI, Zic'-ry, that remembers, a male.
 ZID'DIM, huntings; in Syriac, destructions.
 ZI'DON, hunting, fishing, venison.
 ZIDO'NIANS, inhabitants of Zidon.

ZIF, this, that; according to the Syriac, brightness.
 ZIK'LAG, measure pressed down.
 ZIL'LAH, shadow, which is roasted, the tingling of the ear.
 ZIL'PAH, distillation, contempt of the mouth.
 ZIM'KAN, song, singer, vine.
 ZIM'RI, my field, my vine, my branch.
 ZIN, buckler, coldness.
 ZI'ON, a monument, sepulchre, turret.
 ZI'OR, ship of him that watches, ship of the enemy.
 ZIPH, Ziff, this mouth, mouthful.
 ZIP'FOR, bird, crown; according to the Syriac, early in the morning, goat.
 ZIP'POK, beauty, trumpet.
 ZITH'RI, to hide, overturned.
 ZIZ, flower, a lock of hair; according to the Syriac, wing, feather.
 ZI'ZA. See Zaza.
 ZO'AN, motion.
 ZO'AR, little, small.
 ZO'BAH, an army, a swelling.
 ZO'HAR, white, shining, dryness.
 ZOHE'LETH, that creeps or draws.
 ZOPHAR, Zo'-far, rising early, crown; in Syriac, sparrow, goat.
 ZO'RAH, leprosy, scab.
 ZOROBABEL, Zo-rob'-ba-bel. See Zerubbabel.
 ZUAR, Zew'-ar, small.
 ZUPH, that observes, roof.
 ZUR, stone, plan, form.
 ZURI'EL, the rock or strength of God.
 ZURISHADDAI, Zew'-ry-shad'-da-i, the Almighty is my rock, splendor, beauty.
 ZU'ZIMS, the posts of a door, splendor; in Syriac, departing, money; in Chaldee, strong.

TABLES

OF THE

WEIGHTS, MEASURES, AND MONEY,

MENTIONED IN THE BIBLE.

JEWISH WEIGHTS, REDUCED TO ENGLISH TROY WEIGHT.

	lbs.	ozs.	pen.	gr.
The Gerah, the twentieth part of a Shekel	0	0	0	12
The Bekah, half a Shekel	0	0	5	0
The Shekel	0	0	10	0
The Maneh, sixty Shekels	2	6	0	0
The Talent, fifty Maneh, or three thousand Shekels	125	0	0	0

According to the Bishop of Peterborough's calculations, the Gerah is nearly equal to 11 grains Troy; the Bekah to about $4\frac{1}{4}$ pennyweights; and the Shekel to about $9\frac{1}{8}$ pennyweights.

SCRIPTURE MEASURES OF LENGTH, REDUCED TO ENGLISH MEASURE.

SHORT MEASURES.

Digit					English feet.	Inches.
4	Palm				0	0.912
12	3	Span			0	10.944
24	6	3	Cubit		1	9.888
96	24	6	2	Fathom	7	3.552
144	36	12	6	1.5	Ezekiel's reed	10 11.328
192	48	16	8	2	1.3	Arabian pole . 14 7.104
1920	480	160	80	20	13.3	10 Schoenus's measuring line 145 11.04

LONG MEASURES.

Cubit					English miles.	Paces.	Feet.
400	Stadium or Furlong				0	0	1.824
2000	5	Sabbath day's Journey			0	729	3.0
4000	10	2	Eastern Mile		1	403	1.0
12,000	30	6	3	Parasang	4	153	3.0
96,000	240	48	24	8	A Day's Journey	33	172 4.0

 5 Feet = 1 Pace; 1056 = 1 Mile.

According to the Bishop of Peterborough, a parasang is equal to 4 miles 116 paces.

FOR TABLES OF TIME, SEE THE ARTICLES "MONTHS" AND "DAY."

SCRIPTURE MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

MEASURES FOR LIQUIDS, REDUCED TO ENGLISH WINE MEASURE.

Caph					Gallons.	Pints.
1.3	Log				0	0.625
5.3	4	Cab			0	0.883
16	12	3	Hin		1	2
32	24	6	2	Seah	2	4
96	72	18	6	3	Bath or Epha	7 4
960	720	180	60	20	10	Chomer, Homer, Kor, or Coros . 75 5

WEIGHTS, MEASURES, AND MONEY.

The Omer was one-tenth of an Epha, and contained 6 pints; the Metretes of Syria, translated in John ii. 6, "firkins," $7\frac{1}{2}$ pints; and the eastern Cotyla, half a pint. This Cotyla, says the Bishop of Peterborough, contains just 10 ounces Avoirdupois of rain-water; the Omer, 100 ounces; the Epha, 1000; and the Chomer, 10,000 ounces. So by these weights all these measures of capacity may be expeditiously recovered to a near exactness.

MEASURES FOR THINGS DRY, REDUCED TO ENGLISH CORN MEASURE.

							Pecks.	Gals.	Pints.
Gachal							0	0	0.1416
20	Cab						0	0	2.8333
36	1.8	Omer or Gomer					0	0	5.1
120	6	3.3	Seah				1	0	1
360	18	10	3	Epha			3	0	3
1800	90	50	15	5	Letch		16	0	0
3600	180	100	30	10	2	Chomer, Homer, etc.	32	0	0

TABLES OF MONEY.

JEWISH MONEY, REDUCED TO THE ENGLISH STANDARD.

						£.	s.	d.
Gerah						0	0	1.3687
10	Bekah					0	1	1.6875
20	2	Shekel				0	2	3.375
1200	120	50	Maneh, or Mina	Hebraica		5	14	0.75
60,000	6000	3000	60	Talent		342	3	9

Solidus Aureus, or Sextula, was worth	0	12	0.5
Siclus Aureus, or Gold Shekel	1	16	6
Talent of Gold	5475	0	0

The Bishop of Peterborough makes the Mina Hebraica to contain 60 Shekels, and to weigh 27 oz. $7\frac{1}{2}$ dwts.; which, at 5s. per ounce, will amount to 6*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.*; and the Talent of Silver to contain 50 Minæ, which, at 5s., will equal the amount in this table, 342*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*

ROMAN MONEY MENTIONED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT, REDUCED TO THE ENGLISH STANDARD.

	£.	s.	d.	far.
Mite (Assarium)	0	0	0	$\frac{3}{4}$
Farthing, (Quadrans,) about	0	0	0	$1\frac{1}{2}$
Penny, or Denarius, (Silver,)	0	0	7	3
Pound, or Mina	3	2	6	0

According to the Bishop of Peterborough, the Roman Mite is one-third of our farthing; Quadrans, three-fourths of a farthing; the Assarium, a farthing and a half; and the Assis three farthings.

* * * In the preceding Tables, Silver is valued at 5s., and Gold at 4*l.* per ounce.

Since the publication, in 1727, of Dr. Arbuthnot's "Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures," that celebrated work has been regarded by the best divines as the general standard on these difficult subjects. More recently the Bishop of Peterborough has rendered good service to this part of biblical antiquity by entering into several nice and extensive calculations on the weights and measures mentioned in the Bible, which have, with very few exceptions, confirmed the previous investigations of Dr. Arbuthnot; and as the axiom, "What is new in theology is false," holds good only in regard to the doctrines of Scripture, and not to its statics and numismatics, no hesitation has been felt in presenting the reader, under each of the preceding Tables, with some of the most important of the results which the bishop has thus obtained.

In the abstruse department of mensuration of superficies, the same learned prelate has also ably demonstrated, that the altar of incense, described in Exodus xxx. 2, as consisting of a cubit in length, and a cubit in breadth, and yet "four square," contained exactly one square cubit, that is, three English square feet, and about forty-seven square inches;—that the table of show bread, described in Exodus xxv. 23, as being two cubits long and one broad, and rectangular, contained above six English square feet;—that the boards of the tabernacle, described in Exodus xxvi. 16, as ten cubits in length and a cubit and a half in breadth, and rectangular, contained nearly fifty square feet of English measure;—that the mercy-seat, which Moses is directed to make “two cubits and a half the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof,” Exodus xxv. 17, contained twelve and a half square feet;—that the altar of incense, which was directed to be “a cubit the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and four square,” Exodus xxx. 2, contained upward of three square feet;—that the court of the tabernacle, the orders concerning which were, “The length of the court shall be a hundred cubits, and the breadth fifty everywhere,” Exodus xxvii. 18, comprised upward of sixteen thousand six hundred and thirty-four square feet, or, in English land measure, one rood, twenty-one perches, and twenty-seven and a half feet;—and that the Levites’ glebe, which is thus described in Numbers xxxv. 3-5: “The cities they shall have to dwell in; and the suburbs of them shall be for their cattle, and for their goods, and for all their beasts. And the suburbs of the cities, which ye shall give unto the Levites, shall reach from the wall of the city and outward a thousand cubits round about. And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side two thousand cubits, and on the south side two thousand cubits,” etc.; “and the city shall be in the midst;” contained three hundred and five acres, two roods, and one perch, which was, for each of the four sides, seventy-six acres, one rood, twenty perches, and eighty square feet.

Respecting the Egyptian aroura, which is sometimes mistranslated “acre,” the bishop remarks, “Reflecting upon Moses’s measure by cubits, and,” in the case of the court of the tabernacle, “finding them to be precisely five thousand square cubits, I observed that they were just half ten thousand, which I had observed from Herodotus to be the area of the Egyptian aroura, by which their land was as generally measured as ours is by acres and roods. I called also to mind a passage in Manetho, an Egyptian priest, cited by Josephus in his first book against Apion, where he affirms, that Manetho, in his history of the reign, wars, and expulsion of the Pastors, (whom Africanus affirms to be Phenicians or Canaanites, and Josephus vainly believed to be Jews,) wrote out of the public records of Egypt, that these Pastors made at Abaris a very large and strong encampment, that encompassed ten thousand arouræ, sufficient to contain two hundred and forty thousand men, and long to maintain their cattle. Hence it appears that not only the Egyptians, but also the Phenicians or Canaanites, that had dwelt among them, and had reigned there during the time of six kings successively, used this measure of land called aroura. Now this was long before the time of Moses; for the beginning of Amosis or Tethmosis, who expelled them out of Egypt, was very near the time of Abraham’s death. Wherefore I believe that Moses, who was skilled in all Egyptian learning, especially in surveying, did of choice make the court of the tabernacle to be just half an aroura, which was a known measure to him and his people, and that Divine authority directed him to do so.” In another part of his work he reduces the Egyptian aroura into English measure, and finds it to be three roods, two perches, and fifty-five and a quarter square feet.

STATISTICS OF THE RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES,

ACCORDING TO THE CENSUS OF 1850.

DENOMINATIONS.	Number of Churches.	Aggregate Accommodation.	Average Accommodation.	Total Value of Church Property.	Average Value of Property.
Baptist	8,791	3,130,878	356	$10,931,382	$1,244
Christian	812	296,050	365	845,810	1,041
Congregational	1,674	795,177	475	7,973,962	4,763
Reformed Dutch	324	181,986	561	4,096,730	12,644
Episcopal	1,422	625,213	440	11,261,970	7,919
Free	361	108,605	300	252,255	698
Friends	714	282,823	396	1,709,867	2,395
German Reformed*	327	156,932	479	965,880	2,953
Jewish	31	16,575	534	371,600	11,987
Lutheran*	1,203	531,100	441	2,867,886	2,383
Mennonite	110	29,900	272	94,245	856
Methodist	12,467	4,209,333	337	14,636,671	1,174
Moravian	331	112,185	338	443,347	1,339
Presbyterian	4,584	2,040,316	445	14,369,889	3,135
Roman Catholic	1,112	620,950	558	8,973,838	8,069
Swedenborgian	15	5,070	338	108,100	7,206
Tunker	52	35,075	674	46,025	885
Union	619	213,552	345	690,065	1,114
Unitarian	243	137,367	565	3,268,122	13,449
Universalist	494	205,462	415	1,767,015	3,576
Minor Sects	325	115,347	354	741,980	2,283
Total	36,011	13,849,896	384	$86,416,639	$2,400

* The German Reformed and Lutheran denominations use the same building in many places.

The following table shows the statistics of the principal denominations, according to the latest reports. The numbers of the M. E. Church, North and South, are taken from the Minutes of 1856-7; those of the Baptist Churches from the Baptist Almanac of 1857; those of the Presbyterian Churches, Old and New School, from the reports of the General Assemblies of 1857; those of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church from estimates published in the papers of that denomination, there being no authentic reports of its statistics. Dr. Baird, in "Religion in America," page 505, says it has about 300 ministers, though, on page 521, he says 1000. A prominent Cumberland Presbyterian minister of Nashville thinks there are between 400 and 500, others say 1000, which perhaps includes the licentiates, who are estimated at 400 or 480. The members of the Protestant Episcopal Church are taken from the Church Almanac of 1857; those of the other sects from the most recent reliable reports. The 6718 local preachers of the M. E. Church, North, and the 4660 local preachers of the M. E. Church, South, are counted with the members. Licentiates of other Churches, except the Lutheran, are not counted as ministers. The number of communicants in the Roman Catholic Church is not known: high authorities in that Church claim, old and young, from two to four millions of the population of the United States.

NAME.	Chur.	Min.	Members.	NAME.	Chur.	Min.	Members.
Methodist Episcopal Church, North.....	5884	807,045		Baptists—Church of God (German).....	275	132	13,750
Methodist Episcopal Church, South.....	2340	641,537		Christian (Unitarian).....	607	498	33,040
Methodist Protestant Church	916	70,018		Presbyterian, Old School.....	3251	2411	244,825
Wesleyan Methodist Connection	275	20,000		New School.....	1679	1595	139,115
Primitive Methodist Church	12	1,100		Cumberland	800	100,000
United Brethren (German Methodists).....	1800	250	67,000	Associate.....	267	164	21,588
Evangelical Association (Ger. Meth.).....	190	195	21,076	Associate Reformed	375	315	40,000
African Methodist Episcopal Church.....	300	29,000		Reformed or Covenanters.....	160	108	14,000
African Methodist Episcopal Zion.....	155	6,203		Congregational, Orthodox	1971	1687	197,196
Baptists, Regular	10,774	6935	869,462	Reformed Dutch	332	380	36,297
Disciples, or Campbellites	2,400	1500	180,000	German Reformed	946	350	110,000
Anti-Mission	1,720	825	58,000	Protestant Episcopal	1903	1866	116,735
Free-Will	1,173	1107	49,809	Lutherans	1900	1000	225,000
General	18	16	2,300	Unitarians (Congregational).....	249	287	13,550
Seventh-Day	67	70	7,000	Mennonites	300	250	36,000
Tunkers.....	150	200	8,000	Roman Catholics	1910	1780

THE END.

THE NEW BIBLICAL ATLAS,

AND

Scripture Gazetteer:

WITH

DESCRIPTIVE NOTICES

OF

THE TABERNACLE AND THE TEMPLE.

REVISED BY THOMAS O. SUMMERS.

NASHVILLE, TENN.:
PUBLISHED BY A. H. REDFORD, AGENT,
FOR THE M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH.
1875.

Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1858, by

J. B. M'FERRIN, AGENT,

In the Office of the Clerk of the District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee.

CONTENTS.

MAP No. I.

	PAGE
THE ANCIENT WORLD, showing the probable Settlements of the Descendants of Noah	6
Japheth.....	6
Ham.....	8
Shem.....	9
Kingdom of Nimrod.....	10

MAP No. II.

COUNTRIES MENTIONED IN THE BIBLE.....	10
Mesopotamia.....	10
Arabia.....	11
I. Arabia Deserta.....	11
II. Arabia Petraea.....	11
III. Arabia Felix.....	12
1. The Edomites.....	12
2. The Moabites.....	12
3. The Amalekites.....	12
4. The Midianites.....	12
5. The Ammonites.....	12
6. The Ishmaelites.....	12
7. The Kenites.....	13
Phœnicia.....	13
Egypt.....	13
Assyria.....	15
Aram, or Syria.....	15
Ararat, or Armenia Major.....	16
Chaldaea, or Babylonia.....	16
Media.....	18
Parthia.....	18
Persia.....	18
Africa.....	19
Cush, or Ethiopia.....	19
Libya.....	19
The Ludim.....	19

MAP No. III.

JOURNEYINGS OF THE ISRAELITES.....	20
Tabular View of the Stations.....	24

MAP No. IV.

CANAAN, AS DIVIDED AMONG THE TWELVE TRIBES, from the Time of Joshua to the Accession of David.....	25
Levi.....	26
Reuben.....	26
Gad.....	26
Manasseh.....	26
Judah.....	27
Ephraim.....	27
Benjamin.....	27
Zebulun.....	27
Issachar.....	27
Asher.....	27
Naphtali.....	27
Dan.....	27
Simeon.....	28

MAP No. V.

THE KINGDOM OF ISRAEL IN THE TIME OF DAVID AND SOLOMON.....	28
---	----

MAP No. VI.

	PAGE
PALESTINE, under the Maccabæan and Idumæan Princes, and illustrative of the Period of Christ and his Apostles.....	29
Judea.....	29
Samaria.....	30
Galilee.....	31
Peræa.....	31
Idumæa.....	32
Modern Palestine.....	32

MAP No. VII.

THE JOURNEYS OF THE APOSTLE PAUL; and the Seven Churches of Asia.....	33
St. Paul's First Missionary Journey.....	33
" Second Missionary Journey.....	33
" Third Missionary Journey.....	34
" Voyage to Rome.....	34
" Fourth and last Journey.....	35
The Seven Churches of Asia.....	35

MAP No. VIII.

JERUSALEM AND ITS ENVIRONS.....	36
I. Ancient Jerusalem.....	36
Walls.....	37
Gates and Towers.....	38
Streets and Palaces.....	38
Reservoirs and Pools.....	39
II. Modern Jerusalem.....	39
Public Edifices.....	40
III. Environs.....	41

MAP No. IX.

PHYSICAL MAP OF PALESTINE AND THE ADJACENT COUNTRIES.....	42
I. The Great Valley and Region of Depression.....	42
The Waters of Merom.....	42
The Lake of Tiberias.....	42
The River Jordan.....	42
The Dead Sea.....	43
The Wady el-Arabah.....	44
II. The Region of the Plain adjacent to the Shore.....	44
III. The Table-Lands.....	45
IV. The Lebanon, also the Sinaitic Group.....	46
V. Geological and Mineralogical Features.....	47

MAPS Nos. X. and XI.

THE TABERNACLE: ITS ALTARS, UTENSILS, AND PRIESTS.....	48
The Tabernacle: its Courts.....	48
Altars, etc.....	49
Mode of Encampment.....	50
Garments of the Priests.....	51

MAP No. XII.

Plan of the Temple.....	51
Solomon's Temple.....	51
Herod's Temple.....	53

EXPLANATION.

The classical and other names which do not appear in the Bible are engraved in a thinner letter. The mark ? denotes that the site is doubtful.

INTRODUCTION.

CONSIDERABLE attention has been given during the last thirty years to Biblical Geography: its study has been promoted by the recent laborious investigations of learned men, and by a more careful preparation of maps. Very few localities in Palestine, for instance, had previously been satisfactorily ascertained, either by astronomical observation or geographical survey. The accounts of nearly all early travellers had been loose and indefinite, and often legendary and fabulous. More recent writers, however, have felt the importance of greater care and accuracy, and hence materials have been furnished for the preparation of maps far superior to those hitherto published.

For the arrangement of the present Atlas, the principal guide has been the "Bibel Atlas nach den neuesten und besten Hülfsquellen," the production of Heinrich Keipert, of Berlin, a learned artist, who executed the valuable maps, and wrote the accompanying memoir, for Dr. Robinson's "Biblical Researches." But whilst his publication has formed the basis, the labors of Berghaus, Ritter, Schubert, Guers, and others, have afforded valuable assistance. The Physical Map, constructed by Petermann expressly for this work, will commend itself to the attention of the studious reader. The descriptive matter has been carefully compiled from the works of Burekhardt, Buckingham, Robinson, Wilson, Olin, Barth, Kitto, Coleman, Lynch, Bartlett, and other modern writers.

It is hoped that this improved work may assist many to read the Bible with more interest and profit; and that, so reading, they may, through the blessing of the Divine Spirit, experience the power of that holy book in enlightening the eyes, converting the soul, and rejoicing the heart.

ANCIENT WORLD, showing the probable settlements
of the

DESCENDANTS OF NOAH.

Compiled by E. J. Green.

Shem's descendants from the Hebrews, including the Ishmaelites

THE NEW BIBLICAL ATLAS.

No. I.

THE ANCIENT WORLD.

SHOWING THE PROBABLE SETTLEMENTS OF THE DESCENDANTS OF NOAH.

THE tenth chapter of Genesis contains a brief account of the descendants of Noah. To the inattentive reader it may seem an uninteresting catalogue of names, but to the student it is of the highest value as a clue to the perplexed history of the nations of the earth. It should be remembered that this chapter is an inspired document, which, taken in connection with other portions of Scripture referring to it, will yield much important instruction.

It was the opinion of the ancient fathers, that the distribution of mankind was not left to be settled at random, or according to the exigencies of the moment; but that a distribution of the world, as known to the patriarch Noah, was made by him among his three sons, before any actual migrations from the first settlement, in Armenia, took place. Probability is in favor of this hypothesis; and Dr. Hales, who adopts it, quotes the striking passages, Deut. xxxii. 7-9, and Acts xvii. 26, as tending strongly to support it. He also adduces in its favor an Armenian tradition, quoted by Abulfaragi, which states that Noah distributed the habitable part of the globe, from north to south, between his sons, giving to Ham the region of the blacks, to Shem the region of the tawny, and to Japheth the region of the ruddy.

"We are not warranted," says Dr. J. Pye Smith,¹ "to suppose that the families, or clans, or tribes, or however the groups might be formed, migrated immediately to their respective seats, by any sort of general breaking up. This would presuppose some kind of compulsory enforcement, which neither the nature of the case, nor any intimation in the narrative, warrants us to assume. We may rather conceive that a diversity of movements took place, excited by general conviction of duty and utility, guided in a great measure by patriarchal directions, and strengthened by circumstances which would inevitably occur; such, on the one hand, as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, local inundations, land-slips, proof of unwholesomeness in marshy districts, the annoyance of winged insects, or other noxious animals—urging to depart from disagreeable or dangerous places; and, on the other hand, attractive peculiarities, new and more convenient situations for pasturage, better soils for the various kinds of agriculture, more pleasing sites for dwellings, the formation of towns, and the security of their inhabitants. It is also too probable that there were turbulent men, or those who had perpetrated crimes or occasioned offences, who, with their families and adherents, would quit hastily and travel as rapidly and as far as they could."

The descendants of Japheth are enumerated first in the sacred narrative; and very briefly, as the more remote nations and the least concerned in biblical history. The primitive families of Ham follow; and the generations of Shem, as the most important, are mentioned last. The Canaanites, who lived nearest, are described with the greatest particularity—so that even in one instance the boundaries are stated. Moses describes the individual tribes of the descendants of Gomer, Javan, Cush, Mizraim, and Aram, who lived near him, and even the minor divisions of the family of Joktan.

I. JAPHETH, it appears from Gen. x. 21, was the eldest son of Noah. His name denotes "enlargement," and his boundaries have indeed been wonderfully extended. Not only Europe, but Asia Minor, the whole of the vast regions of Asia north of Taurus, and probably America, were peopled by his posterity. The genealogical table of his race may thus be represented:

¹ In the article NATIONS, DISPERSION OF, Kitto's Biblical Cyclopedia.

1. The descendants of GOMER, the eldest son, spread themselves westward over nearly the whole continent of Europe, retaining, with some slight variation, their paternal name of Gomerians; as Cimmerians, in Asia; Cimbri, in Gaul and Italy; and Cymri, Cambri, and Cumbri, in Wales and Cumberland. Ancient authors identify them also with the Galatæ of Asia Minor, who, according to Josephus, were called Gomeriani, from their ancestor Gomer; from whom came the Gæls, Gauls, and Celtæ of Europe, occupying the countries from the Euxine or Black Sea to the Western Ocean. The descendants of Gomer are mentioned among the northern nations, which should accompany Gog in his conquests in the latter days. Ezek. xxxviii. 6.

Ashkenaz, the eldest son of Gomer, appears to have settled on the coasts of the Euxine Sea, which from him received its primary denomination, Axenus, resembling Ashkenaz. His precise settlement is represented in Scripture as contiguous to Armenia, westward, answering to Bithynia; for the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz are mentioned together. Jer. li. 27. The Armenian language is still called the Ashkenazian. The rabbinical Jews understand by Ashkenaz the whole of Germany; but Kei-pert says such a view is unsupported by testimony. Riphat, the second son, peopled the country east of the Euxine, Paphlagonia, Croatia, and the Alpine regions. Togarmah, or Togarmuth, the third son, inhabited the confines of Armenia and the Caucasian regions. Togarmah is mentioned with Gomer, Ezek. xxxviii. 6; and with Meshech and Tubal, Ezek. xxvii. 13, 14.

2. MAGOG, TUBAL, and MESHECH, sons of Japheth, are noticed by Ezekiel, (xxxviii. 2, 14, 15,) as settled in the north; that is, the space between the Black and the Caspian Seas, and the borders of Scythia. The first of these may be traced in the Mongogians, Mongols, and Moguls; the second in the Toboloski of Siberia; and the third in the Moschici, Moscow, and Muscovites. Reference is made to their descendants in Ezek. xxvii. 13; xxxii. 26; xxxix. 1. The prophet speaks of Magog, as a country, and Gog as its ruler.

3. MADAI was the father of the Medes, who are thus denominated in Scripture: see 2 Kings xvii. 6: Isa. xiii. 17; Jer. li. 11: Dan. v. 28; and probably also of the primitive inhabitants of Hindustan.

4. JAVAN, the fourth son of Japheth, was the father of the Javanians, or Jaones of the Greeks. He had four sons, by whom the different portions of Greece Proper were peopled. Kittim is now generally considered to have settled in Cyprus; and if we proceed on the principle that we are to look first of all for the countries nearest to the Hebrews, distinguished also for their civilization and commerce, hardly any objection can be made to the adoption of the reading Rhodanim for Dodanim, and applying it to the island of Rhodes; or against explaining Tarshish to mean Tarsus in Cilicia, where a very ancient Greek colony (descended from Javan) existed; whereas, Tartessus in Spain, which has been commonly taken for it, was neither inhabited by the Greeks, nor known to the Hebrews at the time that Moses wrote. Tarshish, in the later books of the Bible, may possibly refer to the Spanish Tartessus.

II. HAM and his descendants are next mentioned, Gen. x. 6-20. Ham signifies "heat," or "burnt," and is peculiarly significant of the regions allotted to his race—Africa and the hot southern parts of Asia. The name of this patriarch is preserved in the title given to Egypt, "the land of Ham." Ps. cv. 28. His genealogy may be thus given:

1. CUSH appears to have been the most celebrated of the sons of Ham: he gave his name to the land on both sides of the Red Sea. The portion in Asia, on the Gulf of Persia, still bears the name of Chusistan, from whence his descendants spread over Arabia and part of India, invaded Egypt under the name of "shepherd kings," and thence passed into Central Africa.

Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Sabtechah, and Raamah, the sons of Cush, and his two grandchildren, Seba and Dedan, seem to have settled in Idumea and a portion of Arabia. Raamah founded a city in Arabia, which became noted for its commerce. Ezek. xxvii. 22. Seba, whose queen came to learn of the wisdom of Solomon, was on the Arabian coast of the Red Sea. To the Jews in Palestine it was "the uttermost parts of the earth." Matt. xii. 42. Dedan was a place of merchandise—probably the modern Aden—a port which is again rapidly rising into importance.

2. MISR, or Mizraim, the second son of Ham, settled in Egypt, whence the Egyptians are styled

h. Scripture, Mizraim, (literally, "the two Egypts,") or Mizraites, in the plural form. This country is called in the East, at the present day, "the land of Misr."

Of the sons of Misr, Ludim and Lehabim were probably the Copto-Libyans. The former are joined by Isaiah (lxvi. 19) with Pul, whose settlement is supposed to have been about the island Philæ, near the first cataract of the Nile; by Jeremiah (xlv. 19) with the Ethiopians and Lydians; and by Ezekiel (xxvii. 10) with Phut, as the mercenary soldiers of Tyre: all plainly denoting their African position. The Naphtuhim occupied the sea-coast, called by the Egyptians Nephthys. The descendants of Pathrusim occupied a lower part of Egypt, which in consequence bore the name of Pathros, Isa. xi. 11; and those of Castuhim and Caphtorim, the district which lies between the delta of the Nile and the southern extremity of Palestine. The descendants of these latter people were the Philistines. Caphtor is mentioned by Jeremiah (xlvii. 4) as an island, and is supposed, from its geographical position, to be the island of Crete, which was known to the Egyptians at a very early period, and may have been first colonized by the Caphtorim.

3. PHUT, or "the bow," and his posterity, are supposed to have peopled that part of Africa called Mauritania, which answers nearly to the modern Barbary and Morocco. Pliny mentions a city in this region called Putea, and Ptolemy, a river bearing the actual name of Phut. This is also mentioned by Jerome, who says that the adjacent country was called Regio Phutensis, or "the land of Phut." This region contained Cyrene, a celebrated place of Jewish learning, whose ruins bear testimony to its former splendor.

4. CANAAN, the youngest son of Ham, gave his name to that land which was afterward promised to the children of Abraham for an inheritance. Sidon, the first-born of Canaan, occupied the north-west corner, and built the town of that name, so early celebrated both in sacred and profane history for its luxury and commerce. See Judges xviii. 7: Isa. xxiii. 2. Heth, the second son, was the progenitor of the Hittites, who settled in the south, near Hebron, Gen. xxiii. 3-7; and Jebus and his posterity, the Jebusites at Jerusalem, where they remained till the days of David. 2 Sam. v. 6-9. Beyond these latter, the Emorites, or Amorites, settled, (Num. xiii. 29,) extending themselves beyond Jordan, until they were destroyed by Moses and Joshua, according to the Divine command, for their iniquities.

III. The posterity of SHem possessed the finest regions of Upper and Middle Asia. Shem signifies "renown," which distinctive title was realized by this great branch of the human family, both in a temporal and spiritual sense: especially as from among his posterity was raised up the Messiah, in whom "all the families of the earth shall be blessed."

1. ELAM appears to have settled in Elymais, or Southern Persia, contiguous to the ancient Susiana, or modern Chusistan. The sacred writers, under the name of Elam, comprehended the country of Persia in general. The inhabitants were famous for the use of the bow. Jer. xlix. 34, 35.

2. ASSHUR peopled the land known as Assyria, which became a province of the Cushite empire founded by Nimrod.

3. ARPHAXAD, through his grandson Eber, was the original of the houses of Peleg and Joktan, the progenitors of the two celebrated races of the Hebrews and the primitive Arabs. Peleg probably remained in Chaldea at the time of the dispersion; for his descendant Terah and his family settled at Ur of the Chaldees. Gen. xi. 31. Of the children of Joktan it is said that "their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east." Gen.

x. 30. Faber conjectures that they were the ancestors of the great body of the Hindoos, who still retain a lively tradition of the patriarch Shem.

4. LUD, according to a tradition of the Lydians, quoted by Josephus, was the father of the people that dwelt in Asia Minor.

5. ARAM, by his descendants, planted the fertile country north of Babylonia, called Aram-Naharaim, or "Aram between the two rivers," the Euphrates and Tigris, which the Greeks from thence denominated Mesopotamia, Gen. xxiv. 10; and Padan-aram, or "the level country of Aram." Gen. xxv. 20. This country is frequently rendered Syria in Scripture, which must not be understood as Palestine Syria. Uz, the eldest son of Aram, peopled the northern part of Arabia, the land of Job.

The map includes all the parts of the globe with which the Hebrews were acquainted; and probably it includes countries unknown to them. Sinim, in Isa. xlix. 12, is supposed to mean China, and Phut, Mauritania: they are thus inserted in the map as probable, but not as certain. The localities of the Joktanite tribes in Southern Arabia are generally admitted to be very uncertain. Of the Ishmaelitic tribes very few can be determined; hence, to avoid mere arbitrary decisions, most of them are omitted.

KINGDOM OF NIMROD.—Eastern authors maintain that Nimrod the Cushite, and "mighty hunter," was the first man that wore a crown. His name, says Dr. J. Pye Smith, is rather an appellative, probably given after his death, as descriptive of his character: it signifies "apostasy, impiety, rebellion." The land of Nimrod, (Micah v. 6,) situate in Shinar, (Gen. x. 10,) may have been of no great extent. The principal towns were, 1. Babel, "the city of confusion," which was the original of the great city of Babylon on the Euphrates, and, in after ages, became the capital of the Chaldean empire, and the mistress of Western Asia. Isa. xlii. 19–22: Dan. iv. 30. The tower of Babel, or Birs Nimrod, was on the west bank of the river, and more than three hundred miles from its mouth. The early traditions respecting this ancient structure, and its ancient ruins, show that it was a stupendous work. The mighty mounds which remain are an enduring monument, at once of the ambitious impiety of this early race, and of the avenging justice of God. 2. Erech is supposed to be represented by the imposing mounds of El Assayah, or "the palace of pebbles," on the Euphrates. 3. Calneh, which both ancient and modern authorities concur in fixing as the site of the great city of Ctesiphon, upon the eastern bank of the Tigris. 4. Accad is assigned as the Sittace of the Greeks, and the Akkerkuf of the present time. It is situate about nine miles west of the latter river, where the waters make the nearest approach to the Euphrates. Its present name is Tel Nimrud, "the hill of Nimrod." Its ruins stand upon a gentle elevation, and consist chiefly of masses of sun-burnt bricks.

COUNTRIES MENTIONED IN THE BIBLE.

(FOR CANAAN, see Maps, Nos. 4, 5, 6, and 9; ASIA MINOR, see Travels of the Apostle Paul, Map 7.)

In this map are exhibited "the lands of the Gentiles," all of which have, more or less, an interesting connection with "the land of promise." The first that claims attention, as the scene of some of the earliest events recorded in biblical history, is

MESOPOTAMIA.

The Hebrew name of this country is Aram-Naharaim, which, as before stated, answers to the Greek Mesopotamia, or "the land between the two rivers." Gen. xxiv. 10. The modern Arabs call it El Jesireh, or "the island," it being nearly encompassed by the two great streams, the Euphrates and the Tigris. It extends from the thirty-third degree to the thirty-eighth of north latitude. Armenia, Asia Minor, and Syria, bound it on the west; Babylonia and Arabia Deserta on the south; and Kurdistan on the north. Along its northern boundaries is a branch of Mount Taurus, known to the Hebrews by the name Mash, (Gen. x. 23,) and called by the Arabs Judi. An important stream, the Chebar,¹ flows through the land, and joins the Euphrates near Carchemish. Here Nebuchadnezzar planted a colony of the Jews, among whom was the prophet Ezekiel. 2 Kings xxiv. 15: Ezek. i. 1, 3. The country in general is fertile: the mulberry, olive, and vine flourish without cultivation. The summer is hot and dry, and the winter is generally very mild. This land once contained many populous cities, as Carchemish, Hena, Sepharvaim, and Thelasar, but is now chiefly traversed by nomadic tribes of Arabs.

The Scripture associations of Mesopotamia are of much interest. Here Abram lived in the district of Ur, near the Euphrates. Grotius, Bochart, and Wells placed this spot on the Tigris: recent investigation, however, has fully shown that the present Urfah, on the first-named river, is the true locality. It is now called "Ur of the Chaldees," by the eastern Jews, who make pilgrimages to it as the birthplace of the patriarch. There is a pool of beautiful clear water within the walls of this city, known as "the lake of Abraham the Beloved." The most remarkable circumstance connected with it, is the large number of fish, a species of barbel, which sport unmolested in its waters. From thence Abram removed to Haran, about twenty miles south of Urfah, until, called of God, he left his own country to go to the distant land of Canaan, the future residence of his posterity. Haran is enumerated a thousand years after the call of Abram, among the towns which had been taken by the predecessors of the King of Assyria. It is also mentioned still later among the cities that traded with Tyre. 2 Kings xix. 12: Isa. xxxvii. 12: Ezek. xxvii. 23. "Rebecca's well" still marks the spot, and to it the Ishmaelites, or Bedouins, still resort to pray, and water their flocks. In the New Testament it is called Charan. Acts vii. 4.

¹ This river is not to be confounded with the Chabor or Habor of Assyria, where Shalmaneser colonized the ten tribes.

One of the kings of Mesopotamia subdued the Israelites after the death of Joshua. Judg. iii. 8. His dominions were probably in Lower Mesopotamia. In after-ages the country was seized by the Assyrians: at the dissolution of their empire, it was divided between the Medes and the Babylonians. In the revolutions of kingdoms that followed, it was successively a province of the Medo-Persian, Macedonian, and Parthian empires. At the present day it is subject to Persia.

ARABIA.

Arabia, though chiefly an arid, sandy desert, is a country of much biblical and historical interest. It extends from west to east, commencing at the mouth of the Nile in Lower Egypt, to the Euphrates and Persian Gulf, a distance of one thousand miles; and fourteen hundred miles from the Arabian Gulf to Syria in the north. The Arabs make two great divisions of their land: the northern, which they call Sham, or "the left;" and the southern, called Yemen, or "the right." But Ptolemy and older geographers distinguish it as three separate regions: Arabia Deserta on the east, Arabia Petrea on the west, and Arabia Felix on the south.

The ancient Hebrews denominated this region "the east country," (Gen. xxv. 6,) and its inhabitants "the children of the east." Judg. vi. 3: Job i. 3: 1 Kings iv. 30: Isa. xi. 14. By Arabia they only meant a small district of the country now so called. Ezek. xxvii. 21: 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17. Thus the Arabians are placed in connection with the Philistines. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7. By "all the kings of Arabia" (1 Kings x. 15: Jer. xxv. 24) we may understand the chiefs of wandering tribes, who lived in tents. When the Apostle Paul speaks of having visited Arabia, (Gal. i. 17,) the northern part, adjacent to the country of Damascus, may be intended; but when he says that Sinai is in Arabia, (iv. 25,) he uses the name in its extended signification.

Arabia is supposed to be so called from Arabah, that is, "the desert," a district in Idumea. In Deut. ii. 8, we read of "the way of the plain," in connection with Elath and Ezion-geber: in the original it is Ha-Arabah. As its Ishmaelitic inhabitants wandered over the adjoining territories, the name became extended to them also. The Arabah consists of a great valley, "deep, dreary, and desolate," beginning at Elath and Ezion-geber, and extending to the Dead Sea, which is called "the sea of the plain," or Arabah, in Deut. iv. 49: Josh. iii. 16. It may be regarded as a continuation of the valley of the Jordan. It was the scene of some of the most interesting incidents in the exodus of the Israelites. Here they encamped for thirty-eight years, and here were the graves of that rebellious generation, "whose carcasses fell in the wilderness." Before the time of Burckhardt, this valley had not been traversed by travellers; but his journey through it, together with subsequent investigations by others, has supplied much important illustration of the Holy Scriptures. (See the PHYSICAL MAP, No. IX.)

The parts of the country bordering on Palestine and Egypt were originally peopled by Cush, the son of Ham; hence Cush became a general name for both Arabian and African Ethiopia. The pure Arabians, however, trace their descent to Jôktan, or Kahtan, the son of Heber, and of the posterity of Noah, by Shem; and Kahtan is still the patronymic of the tribes which are widely scattered over the whole of Southern Arabia. Moses mentions thirteen sons of Jôktan, several of whose names are identified by Niebuhr and other travellers with the provinces and towns of this part of the country. A native who can clearly trace his genealogy in this line, is called "an Arab of the Arabs," to mark the purity of his descent. A third class are the descendants of Ishmael, whose "sons became twelve princes according to their nations," in fulfilment of the Divine promise to Abraham. Gen. xvii. 20. Others of the tribes sprang from the two handmaids of Abraham, Hagar, and Keturah. All of these tribes are now divided into two classes, the Arab-al-madar, or "dwellers in clay," and the Bedouins, or "dwellers in the wilderness." Between them there is a great diversity of character and habits. The latter class live in tents made of camel's-hair cloth: their wealth is in their flocks, and to a considerable degree they still maintain the prophetic declaration, "He will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him." Gen. xvi. 12.

I. ARABIA DESERTA is mostly an extensive desert, with scarcely enough vegetation to support the camels by which it is traversed, and with only a few brackish springs and pools of water: neither river nor perennial stream flows over its wide expanse. The naked wilderness is encircled or intersected by barren mountains, with summits rising into rugged peaks. The cooling breeze enjoyed in other sultry climes is here unknown. The air is dry, and often pestilential to animal life. Whole years occasionally pass without rain. According to the impressive description of holy writ, it is "a land of deserts and of pits; a land of drought and of the shadow of death; a land that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt." Jer. ii. 6. A large portion of this country is, to the present day, but little known to travellers. Warlike tribes of Bedouins, each under its respective sheikh, or chieftain, roam over its extensive deserts.

II. ARABIA PETREA, or Rocky Arabia, derives its name from Petra, "a rock," from the numerous rocky districts found within its limits. "To this wild but interesting region belongs a reverence which no other portion of the earth.

Judea excepted, can claim. It was the theatre of many awful and extraordinary events recorded in Jewish history. The sacred eminence of Sinai, on whose cloudy summit the Deity made his pavilion of darkness, when he first issued a system of written laws to the human race; Horeb, with its burning bush, and its caves which gave shelter to Elijah when he fled from the persecution of Jezebel; the pastoral solitudes where the Jewish deliverer, then an exile from Egypt, kept the flocks of Jethro, the priest of Midian; Shur and Paran, with the bitter wells of Marah, and the smitten rock that yielded water; the land of Uz, the scene of the wealth and the woes of Job, of the trial of his patience and the triumph of his piety—are all comprehended within the geography of Petræa.¹

No part of this country has been so carefully traversed as the Peninsula of Sinai. Its general aspect is wild and rugged—a collection of naked rocks and craggy precipices. Sir F. Henniker describes it as “a sea of desolation.” “It would seem,” says he, “as if Arabia Petræa had once been an ocean of lava, and that, while its waves were literally running mountains high, it was commanded suddenly to stand still.” The scene of the giving of the law is still a question among travellers. (See MAP OF THE JOURNEYINGS OF THE ISRAELITES, No. III.)

III. ARABIA FELIX, or “the Happy,” was so called because of its superior fertility. It is mountainous, tolerably well watered, and yields large quantities of corn, coffee, and fruit. The present inhabitants of the land pride themselves on being the only pure and unmixed race of Arabs. They live in cities, and successfully engage in agriculture and commerce.

Among the people who occupied these three great divisions of Arabia, the following are the most considerable:

1. THE EDOMITES. The country of the children of Esau, “who is Edom,” after he “went from the face of his brother Jacob,” was at Mount Seir, an elevated tract, stretching from the southern point of the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Ezion-geber. Its earliest inhabitants were the Horims, or dwellers in caves. Deut. ii. 12, 22. It was in after-ages called by the Greeks and Romans Idumea. The Edomites were a warlike race, and gradually spread eastward and southward over an extensive country. They established several ports on the Red Sea, which were taken by David, and the kingdom of Edom was annexed to his house, until it revolted in the days of Jehoram. 2 Chron. xxi. 8–10. About one hundred and fifty years before the Christian era, the Edomites were again subdued, and were from that time gradually incorporated among the Jewish people, and their national name became extinct. The land, which was once covered with populous cities, and was the emporium of the commerce of the east, is now one of the most inaccessible countries of the world.

The chief city, Petra, (the Joktheel of Scripture), was situated in a deep ravine or defile of rocks, which rise on either side to a vast height, and form a remarkable natural citadel or defence.

In these rocks, reaching to seven hundred feet in height, are cut many of the dwellings and sepulchres of its former inhabitants, fully justifying their being compared to “eagles’ nests.” Silence and obscurity hung over the ruins of this city for ages, until they were brought to light by Burckhardt: since then they have been graphically described by Laborde, Olin, Robinson, Bartlett, and others. The Edomites were in all ages hostile to the Hebrews; hence, by a figure of speech, the enemies of the true Israel of God are denominated Edomites.

A number of striking prophecies concerning Edom have received an exact fulfilment. Instructive particulars on this point will be found in the Rev. Dr. Keith’s admirable work, “The Evidence of Prophecy.”

2. THE MOABITES. The land inhabited by the descendants of the eldest son of Lot is on the east of the Jordan and the Dead Sea: its history is intimately connected with that of Israel and Edom. The people formed a powerful tribe, though too feeble or dispirited to offer resistance to the progress of the Israelites, when on they way to Canaan. They, however, succeeded, conjointly with the Midianites, in enticing the children of Israel into idolatry and sin. Num. xxv. Their capital city was Ar, or Rabbath-Moab, situate on the southern bank of the Arnon. By the Greeks it was called Areopolis, or “the city of Mars.” Its ruins have been discovered by modern travellers. The vine and grain here flourish as in former times, and it is still the best pasture-ground in all Syria. The prophet Isaiah (chaps. xv., xvi.) describes many of the chief towns of Moab as grieving over the conquest and desolation of the country, caused by the invasion of the Assyrians.

3. THE AMALEKITES had their possessions on the west of Edom: they were called, in the prophecy of Balaam, “the first of the nations.” Num. xxiv. 20. They are described as occupying the whole region from Shur in Egypt to Havilah, or the Persian Gulf. 1 Sam. xv. 7.

4. THE MIDIANITES were the descendants of Abraham and Keturah, through their son Midian: they settled near Mount Horeb. A considerable part of their land was traversed by the Israelites, after they had come out from Egypt, and towards whom they manifested a friendly disposition. There was, however, a division or class of this people who were the allies of Moab, (Num. xxii. 4, 5,) and were overthrown by Gideon. Judg. vi.

5. THE AMMONITES, the offspring of Ben-Ammi, the son of Lot, inhabited the country between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok. They were subsequently driven by the Amorites more to the east. This people were in constant hostility with the Israelites; and against them Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos, and Zephaniah, were directed to prophesy. Their name disappears from history before the birth of Christ: they were amalgamated with other tribes of Arabs. Rabbath was their chief city. Deut. iii. 11.

6. THE ISHMAELITES. Nebajoth and Kedar were the two eldest sons of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 13: the former gave the name to the region about Mount Hor; the latter wandered far into the centre of the desert, dwelling under black tents, covered with hair-cloth. Sol. Song i. 5. They were rich in herds, (Isa. lx 7,) and were expert and warlike archers. Isa. xxi. 16, 17: Ps. cxx. 5, 7. Dumah, the third son of Ishmael, directed his way to the east, near the Persian Gulf. A prophecy was directed against his descendants. Isa. xxi. 11. Tema, the ninth son, (Gen. xxv. 15,) is spoken of by Isaiah (xxi. 14) in connection with the caravans of Dedan. The other sons of Ishmael spread over that part of Arabia which lies south of Palestine, extending as far as Shur, near Egypt, with which latter country they carried on commerce so early as the days of Jacob. Gen. xxxvii. 25; xxxix. 1.

¹ Crichton’s Arabia, i. 45.

7. The KENITES: a tribe of Midianites, dwelling near or among the Amalekites, in the south-western part of Arabia Petræa. They "showed kindness to the children of Israel when they came out of Egypt," and, in return, Saul, when he went against the Amalekites, desired them to withdraw, that they might not share the fate of his enemies. Num. xxiv. 20, 21: 1 Sam. xv. 6.

PHENICIA.

Phœnicia was a fertile province of Syria, on the western declivity of Lebanon, and bordering upon the Mediterranean. Its limits varied at different times: generally it was included within two degrees of latitude, and was of narrow breadth. In the New Testament it is known as "the coasts of Tyre and Sidon," which cities it included, as well as some others not mentioned in Scripture. It was also called Syro-Phœnicia; and was in later times considered as a part of the land of Canaan. Matt. xv. 22, 24: Mark vii. 26. Its inhabitants were enterprising navigators, and the country has been honorably called "the birthplace of commerce." Phœnician pilots and sailors navigated the vessels of Solomon; and before other ships had ventured to lose sight of their own shores, colonies of this people were established in some of the most distant parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa. They were also distinguished for their knowledge of the arts and sciences. Phœnician workmen were employed at the building of the first temple, and by Phœnicians the knowledge and use of letters were introduced into Greece. The climate of the country is mild; the land is abundantly watered with streams, and yields large crops of fruit, corn, cotton, and sugar. But its once populous and opulent cities are reduced, under the rule of a despotic government, to impoverished villages or masses of ruins.

EGYPT.

Egypt, next to Judea, holds the most conspicuous place in the inspired volume. It is now commonly divided into three great divisions: Lower Egypt, or the Delta, so called from its triangular shape, resembling the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet; Central Egypt, comprehending a considerable portion of the valley of the Nile—the most fertile part of the whole country; Upper Egypt, or Said, where the mountains that enclose the valley mostly press "so closely on the river as to render the district little more than a mountain glen." Egypt, in fact, may be said to consist of the valley of the Nile, ascending from north to south; all beyond being wide and almost uninhabitable desert. Upper Egypt is also known in Scripture as Pathros, or "the land of the south." Ezek. xxix. 14; xxx. 14: Jer. xlv. 15.

THE NILE.

The ancient name of Egypt was Mizraim or Misr, from the son of Ham, who first peopled it after the deluge. The present inhabitants still call it Misr. Bochart, however, contends that the word Misraim is to be understood as a dual form to denote the two Egypts, the Upper and the Lower, and that it is derived from a word meaning "narrow," in allusion to the shape of the country. In the poetical parts of the Bible it is sometimes called Rahab, Isa. li. 9: Ps. lxxxix. 10; a name signifying "sea-monster," probably in allusion to the crocodile and other aquatic animals for which the Nile was celebrated.¹ Some geographers have considered the Egyptian valley as belonging to Asia rather than Africa. Others have divided the country into two parts, the east and the west banks of the ¹ Kitto's Biblical Cyclopaedia, vol. ii.; and our edition of Watson's Dictionary.

Nile, assigning the former to Asia, the latter to Africa.¹

Egypt, as the scene of the captivity of the children of Israel, and as the subsequent conqueror of that people, as well as from the frequent intercourse between the two nations, is a country of high interest to the biblical student. In the prophetic writings of the Old Testament, Egypt is frequently noticed. Isaiah publishes "the burden of Egypt," in the nineteenth chapter of his prophecy, in which he foretells the internal dissensions of the country, and, as is commonly interpreted, the cruelties of Cambyses, and the severe calamities under which the country suffered. He announces also the worship of the true God; and the deliverance of Egypt, as is conjectured, by the interposition of Alexander the Great, in the age of the Ptolemies and Seleucids. Jeremiah, who lived in the time of Nebuchadnezzar's attack on Jerusalem, and subsequently became a sojourner in the Egyptian territory, has many messages from God respecting the history of the land of Egypt, predicting particularly its overthrow by the power of Nebuchadnezzar. Ezekiel foretells in like manner the conquest of Egypt, and its subsequent degradation as the basest of the kingdoms, no more exalted above the nations, and having no more its own prince. Joel declares that "Egypt shall be a desolation;" and Zechariah, that its "sceptre shall depart." A survey of Egyptian history, and its present abject condition amidst the nations, sufficiently illustrate the truth of these prophecies.

There is one impressive fact which must not be forgotten. Egypt was the home of Jesus, when a child, according to the ancient prophecy. Hos. xi. 1: Matt. ii. 15. Here he dwelt who, in his Divine nature, is King of kings and Lord of lords, but who "humbled himself, and took upon him the form of a servant," that as man he might "taste death for every man."

The fertility and wealth of Egypt are caused by the annual overflow of its far-famed river. In the month of May the whole land becomes parched, and assumes the appearance of a wilderness. By June, men and animals are suffering from the thirst and heat induced by the scorching and dry atmosphere. Early in July the mountain waters from Abyssinia begin to flow down and join the Nile. The river continues to rise from that time, and gradually overflows its banks, till the end of September, when nearly the whole land is converted into a red muddy sea, while the only prominent objects above the waters are the cities, towns, date trees, and the dykes, which latter now serve as footpaths for traffic. In November the seed-corn is sown, when the waters begin to recede; and from December to February, the whole land is a paradise of fertility. At the close of April the harvest is gathered and stored, and the land returns to its arid and sterile appearance. The produce of corn from the rich slime, which is deposited over the land at the subsidence of the waters, is astonishingly abundant. Hence Egypt has, in all ages, been noted for its supplies to neighboring countries, particularly Syria and Arabia. In times of scarcity, which were frequent in those countries, Egypt alone could save their numerous population from famine. The affecting story of Jacob and his sons furnishes a striking illustration of this fact.

The various branches of the Nile have their rise in the high lands north of the equator; and, flowing through Abyssinia and other regions westward of it, meet in the country of Senaar. The united stream flows northward through Nubia and Egypt, and after a course of more than eighteen hundred miles from the farthest explored point of its principal branch, enters the Mediterranean by several mouths, which form the Delta of Egypt. In a distance of thirteen hundred and fifty nautical miles the Nile does not receive a single tributary stream, which, as Humboldt remarks, is a solitary instance in the hydrographic history of the globe. The Nile is known in Scripture as Sihor, or Shihor. Isa. xxiii. 3: Jer. ii. 18.

The province of Goshen, which was given by Pharaoh to Jacob and his family, was the southern part of the Delta. Goshen means "pasture-land." It has always been celebrated for its fertility, and was therefore well suited for the purposes of shepherds. It possessed the further advantage of nearness to the wilderness of Etham, through which their cattle could range during the winter. According to Dr. Robinson, the inhabitants of this region "still drive their mingled flocks of sheep and goats for pasturage to this quarter of the desert." In the district generally assigned as the ancient Goshen, traces are found, it is thought, of the residence of the Israelites in large heaps of ruins, called by the Arabs "Jews' hills" and "Jews' graves."¹ Robinson, however, is disposed to think that these mounds can only be referred back to the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era.

Our first acquaintance with the Egyptians in Scripture introduces us to them as a people arrived at a high degree of civilization. It is evident, from the ancient monuments now existing, that at a very early period they had reached an advanced state of perfection in agriculture, legislation, and the arts. Many learned men have directed their attention to the remains now profusely scattered over the country, and have found in them unambiguous corroboration of Scripture history. "The whole monumental wonders and antiquities of the land seem to have been preserved as if for the express purpose of evincing the authenticity and illustrating the narratives of the Bible; every single allusion of which, either to the circumstances of the country or of the people, is seen to have the minutest consistency with truth—so strikingly, indeed, as to have attracted the attention of every Egyptian antiquary."²

The River of Egypt, (Num. xxxiv. 5: Josh. xv. 4, 47: 2 Kings xxiv. 7,) or Sihor. Though by way of eminence the term may be applied to the Nile, which was called emphatically "The river." (Gen. xli. 1.) yet in several places of the Old Testament it refers to a much smaller stream, situate at the southern border of Canaan. Dr. Richardson supposes it to be a small rivulet, about thirty yards wide, called Wady Gaza, and which is quite dry in summer. It is more generally considered to be the stream El-Arish. Amos calls it "the river of the wilderness," (vi. 14,) as being on the border of an extensive tract of desert country.¹

¹ Niebuhr, i. 100.

² Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible: see also Osburn's Antiquities of Egypt.

¹ Sir G. Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians.

[For the principal places and cities of Egypt, we must refer to the Gazetteer, at the end.]

ASSYRIA.

In ancient geography, Assyria is a country east of the Tigris, bounded on the north by Armenia, east by Media, and south by Susiana and Chaldaea. It is to be distinguished from Syria, (Aram,) the country of which Damascus was the capital, and whose boundary joined the land of Israel on the south. As a kingdom it is generally said to have been founded by Asshur, or Assur, the son of Shem, who, on leaving Shinar, travelled northward and founded Nineveh. Borchart, Faber, and Hales, however, adopt the marginal reading of Gen. x. 11: "Out of that land, he [that is, Nimrod] went out into Assyria [Asshur] and builded Nineveh:" which interpretation is now commonly adopted.

Assyria is watered by several rivers, the chief of which is the Tigris, or Hiddekel of Scripture. The southern and northern parts of the land are mountainous, though well adapted for pasturage, and the growth of fruit, corn, and cotton. In these mountains Shalmaneser colonized the inhabitants of Ephraim and Galilee, when he put an end to the kingdom of the ten tribes. 2 Kings xvii. They are now inhabited partly by the Nestorians: their forefathers embraced Christianity, which once flourished among them, but for several centuries the people have sunk into a rude and superstitious ignorance, and are now the objects of missionary enterprise.

The first mention in Scripture of the Assyrian empire is upon the mission of Jonah to Nineveh, about 862 B. C.: after that time it is more or less connected with the history of the Jews. For a long period it was of small extent, but there arose a succession of warlike kings, who carried their conquests over Media, Persia, Mesopotamia, Palestine, and other countries, and who formed one of the mightiest sovereignties which have existed on the earth, B. C. 750 to B. C. 612. This vast empire was subverted by the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar: since then Assyria has successively belonged to the Greeks, Romans, Persians, Saracens, and Turks.

NINEVEH was built on the Tigris, and by some writers is estimated to have been forty-eight, or even sixty, miles in circumference. In the book of Jonah it is described as "an exceeding great city, of three days' journey." It was surrounded by a wall one hundred feet high, and so broad that three carriages could be driven abreast on it. Fifteen hundred towers, each two hundred feet high, at intervals, protected the city. In the days of Jonah there were in it one hundred and twenty thousand children "who knew not their right hand from their left;" which would lead to the calculation that it possessed two millions of inhabitants. Her merchants are said by the prophet Nahum (iii. 16) to have been more in number than the stars of heaven.

The Greek historian Herodotus records the fate of Nineveh, and indicates the spot where it stood; but after his time the site of this renowned city was rapidly forgotten, and for ages was a matter of conjecture. In the second century of the Christian era, Lucian, who was a native of a city on the banks of the Euphrates, says that "no vestiges of it at present remain, nor can it be easily ascertained where formerly it stood." Subsequent writers considered the knowledge of its locality as entirely lost. During the present half century, however, by the researches of Rich, Botta, and especially Rawlinson and Layard, not only has its site been clearly ascertained, but the treasures of antiquity, concealed for centuries beneath extensive mounds of earth, have been uncovered, and much light has thus been thrown on the customs and religious rites of the inhabitants of this once famous place. Mr. Layard commenced in 1845 the excavation of the great mound, long known to the natives of the region by the name Nimroud, situate near the Tigris. The singularly interesting details of his progress and success will be found in his valuable work, "Nineveh and its Remains."¹ Many of the massive sculptures, bas-reliefs, instruments of war and domestic articles, in a good state of preservation, recovered from the ruins, now enrich the treasures of the British Museum. Several of these striking monuments throw a new and valuable light on various portions of the prophetic writings of Ezekiel, Nahum, and Zephaniah, and confirm the truth of the sacred writings.

ARAM, or SYRIA.

Aram, or "the high land," was the original name of Syria, and a part of Mesopotamia. The Grecian name Syria is of doubtful origin. It was peopled by Aram, the fifth son of Shem. It forms a part of the lofty and extensive chain of mountains known as Lebanon, including the celebrated Hermon and Hor. Some of the most beautiful and poetical passages of the Scripture have reference to this pasture-range. The Orontes, Abana, and Pharpar are the most distinguished rivers, adding to the splendor of the landscape and the fertility of the soil.

Little more is known of the early history of Syria than that its people were a populous and powerful nation, divided into tribes, and maintained their independence for centuries. In the time of David, Hadadezer, King of Zobah, appears to have held the other chiefs as tributaries. But in the course of time the sovereign authority was transferred to Damascus. 1 Kings xi. 24. The Syrians were most hostile neighbors to the Israelites, and on several occasions invaded their land. At length the latter were overcome by Tiglath-Pileser, and their country added as a province to the Assyrian empire. 2 Kings xvi. Syria was favored with the gospel in the first days of the Christian Church. St. Paul and other apostles labored at Damascus and Antioch, and, to a great extent, idolatry gave place to the pure doctrines of the cross. At the present time, the inhabitants belong to the Greek, Syrian, Romish, and Armenian Churches; but ignorance and superstition extensively prevail among all classes and sects.

¹ See Art. NINEVEH in our edition of Watson's Dictionary, and the works of Bonomi, Rawlinson, Layard, and others, to which allusion is there made.

¹ But see our edition of Watson's Dictionary, Art. SINOR.

The petty kingdoms into which Syria was divided varied very much during the period of Old Testament history. The following are the principal:

ARAM-BETH-REHOB was in Cœlo-Syria, or "hollow Syria," which lay between the two great ridges of Libanus and Anti-libanus. The most remarkable object remaining in this region is the splendid ruin of Baalbec, or the temple of the sun.

ARAM-BETH-MAACHAH included the southern declivity of Hermôn and the adjoining district. The Syrians of Maachah were conquered by the army of David, under Joab. 2 Sam. x. 6-14.

ARAM-DAMMESEK lay between the rivers of Abana and Pharpar, having Damascus for its chief city. The "land of Hadrach" (Zech. ix. 1) formed a part of this country.

ARAM-ZOBAB was on the north of Damascus, stretching eastward to the Euphrates, forming the most extensive and powerful of these minor kingdoms. Its princes commonly bore the name of Hadadezer. In the time of David, the King of Zobah held the other chiefs as tributaries. But, in the course of time, the sovereign authority was transferred to Damascus. Many flourishing cities belonged to this division, as Riblah, Tadmor, Helbon, Antioch, Seleucia, and Carchemish.

ARAM-HAMATH, which now constitutes the province of Orontes. Its capital was called by Amos, (vi. 2,) "Hamath the great," and was one of the oldest cities of the world. In Gen. x. 18, the Hamathites are named among the descendants of Canaan.

ARAM-MAACHAH adjoined the portion of Reuben on the south: its name signifies a country hemmed in or enclosed by mountains.

ARAM-NAHARAIM, or "Syria between the two rivers," was also called Padan-Aram, "the plain of Aram;" it was termed Mesopotamia by the Greeks. See MESOPOTAMIA.

ARAM-HAURAN was an extensive district on the north-east of Canaan.

There were some other minor districts in Aram, which, however, have no connection with Scripture history.

ARARAT, OR ARMENIA MAJOR.

The name of this extensive region is, by some authors, derived from Ar-men, which denotes "the mountainous country of Meni," or Minni. Its inhabitants are mentioned under the latter name by Jeremiah, (li. 27.) In the original text of the Bible it is called the land of Ararat, (Isa. xxxvii. 38,) and the kingdom of Ararat. 2 Kings xix. 37. The whole of the country is elevated, and intersected by the extensive ranges of the Caucasus and Taurus, which, during a greater part of the year, are covered to a considerable depth with snow. Among these mountains the Tigris and the Euphrates have their rise, as well as other streams of lesser note. Armenia possesses a dry, clear atmosphere, and is salubrious. The valleys are warm and fruitful: in ancient times, the country is said to have abounded in precious stones and metals. The early inhabitants of Armenia were known for their warlike habits, but the moderns are devoted to trade and commerce, in the pursuit of which they are found in most parts of the world. Their religion differs but little from the Greek Church in its ritual and government. The country is now divided in subjection to the Persians, the Turks, and the Russians.

EDEN has been placed in Armenia; but after all the resources of learning and researches of geographers, nothing can be satisfactorily affirmed on the subject. Eden is declared to have been intersected by the rivers Hiddekel, or the Tigris, and the Euphrates, (Gen. ii. 14,) which has led to the conclusion that the abode of our first parents was in a part of the country of South Armenia. "The rivers Pishon and Gihon may have been only branches of the two larger rivers, as the two words in the Oriental languages are appellatives, separate or prefixed, signifying a stream in general."¹

MOUNT ARARAT, on which the ark rested, is shown by modern travellers, as well as the tradition of the people, to be Mount Masis, a name signifying "the mountain of descent." It is in the north-eastern part of Armenia. Since the days of Noah, it is probable no human being ever reached its summit, until, in 1829, Dr. Parrot, a German, after a perilous adventure, succeeded in standing on one of the highest summits of the mountain. The snow-crowned summit of this mighty peak is sometimes visible at a distance of nearly two hundred miles. "The approach to the mountain is very impressive. A vast plain lies before it, studded with numerous villages; the glittering waters of a noble river flow through the fresh green of the vale, and several ranges of mountains are clustered around the base of the huge Ararat. The ice-peaks of its double head rise in majesty into a cloudless sky; and as the sun blazes on the snow, a radiance is reflected that dazzles the eyes of the beholder. Unable to rest for any length of time upon the bright glory of the summits, the eye wanders down its giant sides, until the thoughts are bewildered and lost in the grandeur of the scene."²

CHALDÆA, OR BABYLONIA.

The two names, Babylonia and Chaldæa, are generally applied to the same country. The city of Babylon gave its name to the region around it, which was more anciently known as the land of Shinar, Gen. x. 10; xi. 2: the south-eastern part of the country, lying toward Arabia, was more strictly known to the prophets as the land of the Chaldeans. Jer. xxiv. 5: Ezek. xii. 13. The former, Babylonia, was "the desert of the sea" of Isaiah, (xxi. 1,) and by Jeremiah was said to "dwell upon many waters." Jer. li. 13. The latter term, Chaldæa, was derived from the fact of the inundations of the Euphrates, as also from the numerous canals, described by early writers, formed to carry off the floodings, and for purposes of transit. These were "the waters of Babylon," by which the children of Israel sat down and wept. Ps. cxxvii. 1.

¹ Dr. J. Pye Smith, in Kitto's Biblical Cyclopædia, Art. PARADISE. See also Watson's Dictionary, Art. EDEN.

² Sir R. K. Porter's Travels.

Chaldæa, in its enlarged sense, was bounded on the south-west by the Persian Gulf; by Mesopotamia and Assyria on the north; Persia and Susiana on the east, and Arabia on the west. Mr. Faber supposes that the country was early peopled by the Chasdim, or Chusdim, who were the remnant of the military Cuthites, and that they continued to occupy Babylonia after the dispersion of their brethren. They were a tribe of pastoral warriors, who besides professed themselves to be magi, or astrologers. In such capacity they probably continued long to exist in Babylonia, as a distinct race of priests and philosophers, rather than as a nation of themselves. The Chaldæan language was not unlike the Hebrew; some small portions of the Old Testament Scriptures are written in it, as Dan. ii. 4 to vii. 28: Ezra iv. 8 to vi. 8; vii. 12-16: Jer. x. 11.

The soil of Chaldæa is astonishingly fertile: wheat and barley yield from two hundred to three hundred-fold. Commerce was carried on to a considerable extent by means of the large navigable rivers and canals, which opened on the west the trade of Syria and Asia Minor, and of Persia, Arabia, and India on the east. It was "a land of traffic, a city of merchants." Ezek. xvii. 4. The kingdom was one of the four "thrones" described by Daniel, and is set forth under the symbol of a lion with eagle's wings.

Babylon, the metropolis, also called Sheshach, was built by Nimrod, on the same spot as the tower of Babel. (See page 10.) It was raised to its greatest state of splendor under Nebuchadnezzar, so as to be entitled "The glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldee's excellency." References are frequently made in the sacred volume to its magnificence, its splendid temples and its golden idols, its great extent and luxurious inhabitants. It was, according to Herodotus, sixty miles in circumference. The shape of the city was that of a square, traversed each way by twenty-five principal streets, intersecting each other. The walls, from the most moderate accounts, were seventy-five feet in height, and thirty-two in breadth. They were surrounded by a deep ditch, and were entered by a hundred gates, formed of solid brass. Within the city was the temple of Belus, or Jupiter, forming a square of a quarter of a mile. As a considerable portion of the area consisted of gardens and plantations, Major Rennel supposes that Babylon, in its most flourishing state, did not contain more than 1,200,000 inhabitants. The ruins of this celebrated place are of prodigious extent, and some of them remarkable for their size, solidity, and perfect state. The map here given will show the present position of the ruins, and the several features of the country. The appearances of the immense masses of ruin are grand, gloomy, and desolate, strikingly answering to the doom denounced by the prophets against this "golden city." It is indeed "a possession for the bitter, and pools of water;" swept "with the besom of destruction." Isa. xiv. 4-23.¹ Its walls, temples, and palaces have long since been destroyed, and solitude now reigns on a spot where once the sounds of life were heard from assembled multitudes. The remains consist of three principal piles, and are severally known as the Mujellibe, the Kasr, and the Birs Nimroud. These have been explored by Messrs Rich, Buckingham, Mignan, Layard, and other modern travellers, whose interesting descriptions of these memorials of fallen greatness teach a solemn lesson to mankind. They impressively illustrate the truth, that the loftiest and boldest will be visited for their sins, and that neither nations nor individuals have ever hardened themselves against God and prospered. The only way to avert his just displeasure is by timely repentance, and unfeigned faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, as the only Saviour of sinners.

¹ See Keith's Evidence of Prophecy.

MEDIA.

Ancient Media comprised that portion of Western Asia which lay on the north of Elam, or West Persia. It extended from the Caspian Sea to the borders of Persia Proper, and was divided into Lesser and Greater Media. The latter embraced a mountainous region, with broad, fertile valleys, enjoying a salubrious climate. Lesser Media is, for the most part, warm, damp, and unhealthy, though favorable to vegetable growth. The mountains are adorned with extensive forests of oak, beech, and chestnut trees. This is the native land of the peach: oranges and other fruits are produced in abundance. The land contains many fountains of naphtha, which have burnt from one century to another, and are the objects of Divine honors by the fire-worshippers who reside near them. The capital of the land was Ecbatana, founded, or strengthened and enlarged, by Dejoces, (the Arphaxad of the Apocrypha,) the first independent king of the country. The whole of Media belonged, at a very early period, to the Assyrian empire. After the time of Sennacherib, Media obtained the preëminence, and in its turn Assyria was reduced to one of its provinces. Contemporaneously with the downfall of Babylon, "the kingdom and laws" of the Medes and Persians arose. To this land Shalmaneser carried his Israelitish captives, on his taking Samaria, their capital, (2 Kings xviii. 9-11,) B. C. 721. The ancient inhabitants of the land are supposed to have descended from Madai, the third son of Japheth. They were bold and relentless warriors, (Jer. li. 13, 28: Isa. xiii. 17, 18,) and for many ages they occupied a distinguished position in the history of nations, until the time of Cyrus, B. C. 538, when they became incorporated with the Persians, and so continue to the present day.

PARTHIA.

Parthia was on the north-eastern boundary of the Greater Media. According to Justin, the name Parthians signifies, in the Scythian language, "exiles," or "wanderers." At first the term Parthia referred only to a small mountainous district, but afterward had a more extended application. It was for many ages a province of Persia. Having been subdued by Alexander the Great, about 330 B. C., it came under the dominion of the Grecian empire. In the year 250 before the Christian era, Arsaces, a noble chieftain, threw off his allegiance, and by a successful revolt became the founder of the Parthian kingdom. He followed up his conquests by an invasion of Persia, and extended his authority on the west to the banks of the Euphrates. The empire which he established maintained itself for nearly five hundred years; but at length the Persians subdued the reigning monarch of Parthia, and annexed the country to their dominions. Among the Jews who came to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover were some from Parthia. Acts ii. 9. Christianity spread among the people, but appears soon to have degenerated from its simplicity, and at the present day only a few Armenians represent the Christian faith, and that in a degenerate form. The ancient Parthians were noted for their skill in archery and horsemanship. They have been called the Cossacks of the East. Calmet supposes that their name means "horsemen." The peculiar mode of discharging their arrows while they were retiring full speed, has been greatly celebrated by the ancients, who observed that their flight was more terrible than their attack. The country consists principally of bare mountains and sandy steppes, and is but thinly peopled.

PERSIA.

Persia, called by the Hebrews Paras, was in its original state of small extent, confined probably to the single province now known as Phars, a district first mentioned in Scripture as Elam, from the eldest son of Shem, who settled here. In its widest range, Persia was bounded by Media and the Great Desert on the north, Assyria on the west, the Persian Gulf on the south, and eastward by another desert that lay between it and the river Indus. The history of this country properly begins in the time of Cyrus, B. C. 536, previous to which the country was subject chiefly to the Medes. At length it became so extended as to include Elam, Media, Palestine, and even Assyria; and in its height of glory extended to 2800 miles in length, and 2000 in breadth. In its enlarged boundary it is spoken of in Scripture, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 20, 22: Ezra iv. 5; vi. 14: Esth. i. 3, 18; x. 2. Several of the monarchs of Persia are mentioned in the sacred writings. Cyrus, who began to reign in the year B. C. 559, issued a decree in favor of the return of the Jews to their native land. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22: Ezra i. 7, 8. His son Cambyses, or Ahasuerus, suspended the building of the temple. Ezra iv. 6. Smerdes, or Artaxerxes, continued to prohibit the progress of the work of God at Jerusalem, Ezra iv. 7; but Darius, who ascended the throne B. C. 521, published an edict in favor of the Jews, which encouraged them to proceed with vigor in the erection of their temple and city. His grandson, Artaxerxes Longimanus, called Ahasuerus in the Scriptures, raised Esther to the throne, and greatly favored her people. Ezra vii. 1: Esth. ii. 16. Persepolis was the capital of this kingdom. It is now a heap of ruins, among which Sir John Chardin observed figures of rams' heads with horns, one higher and the other lower, "exactly corresponding," as Dr. Hales observes, "to Daniel's vision of the Medo-Persian empire, (Dan. viii. 3,) the lower horn denoting the Medes; the higher, which came up last, the Persians." Herodotus determines the position of Palestine in the Persian empire: he says, "Under the fifth satrapy was comprehended the tract of country which extends from the city of Posideum, built on the frontiers of Cilicia and Syria, as far as Egypt, part of Arabia alone excluded. The same satrapy, moreover, included all Phœnicia, the Syrian Palestine, and the isle of Cyprus." Over this province it would appear that Tatnai, mentioned Ezra v. 6, governed. In the time of Nehemiah, Syria appears to have formed more than one government: see Neh. ii. 7-9; which also is learned from common history. When divided, it is probable that Palestine was included in the government of Cœlo-Syria. The Hebrews, it would seem, were indulged with native governors, invested with full powers for internal government, but subject to the control of the governor of the satrapy. Nehemiah was the last of these governors; but the internal administration was left in the hands of the high-priests till the overthrow of the Persian empire by Alexander.

Persia is traversed by the Araxes and a few other rivers, but which are mostly lost in sandy deserts or lagoons. The former rises in the high ridge of mountains which ascend from the shore of the Persian Gulf. These mountains enclose some beautiful broad valleys and fine plains, which are not only fertile, but enjoy a peculiarly healthful atmosphere and a clear bright sky. In one of these valleys are the remains of the palaces and sepulchres of the ancient monarchs of the country. The valley of Shiraz has been in every age celebrated for its loveliness and fertility. The southern part of the kingdom, however, which lies on the Erythræan Sea, is a barren waste, and almost uninhabitable. The manners and customs of the Persians have but little changed during the lapse of centuries. "At every step," says Mr. Morier, "some object, some dress, or some custom of common life reminds the traveller of ancient times, and confirms, above all, the beauty, the accuracy, and the propriety of the language and the history of the Bible."

The ancient Persians were a kind of infidel idolaters. They had neither temples, altars, nor images, nor did they conceive that any of these were necessary, believing that the Deity resided in light and fire. Hence they worshipped the sun and other heavenly bodies; but in succeeding ages they adopted several of the idolatrous rites of the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Zoroaster, who, it has been conjectured, was "an apostate disciple of the prophet Ezekiel," framed a code of laws for the Persians, and reduced their worship to some kind of system. At a very early period of the Christian era, the gospel appears to have been conveyed to Persia by those Jewish converts who were at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. But no period of the history of this country can be pointed out in which the triumphs of the gospel hold a distinguished place. On the contrary, though at some periods many Christians were to be found in that extensive empire, Persia has in general resisted all attempts made to spread Christianity among its inhabitants. The Mohammedan imposture has long overrun the breadth and length of the kingdom.¹

AFRICA.

A slight notice only is required of the countries on the west of Egypt, comprising the northern parts of the continent of Africa.

CUSH, or ETHIOPIA. The latter term is employed indiscriminately in the Bible for all the countries that sprang from the posterity of Cush, both in Africa and Arabia. The descendants of Cush were numerous, and widely spread. Their original settlements were in Arabia and Persia; from thence they migrated over Egypt into Northern Africa. Strabo describes them as "a twofold people, lying extended in a long tract from the rising to the setting sun." Herodotus distinguishes the eastern Ethiopians in Asia from the western Ethiopians in Africa, by the straight hair of the former, and the curly hair of the latter.² Ancient Ethiopia included the countries now called Nubia and Abyssinia. It was mountainous and well watered; hence we read of "the rivers of Ethiopia." Isa. xlviii. 1: Zeph. iii. 10. It was known to the Hebrews as Sheba, or Seba. Isa. xliii. 3: Ps. lxxii. 10. Their present descendants are the woolly-headed negroes of the interior of that continent. Mr. Faber, however, maintains that they are to be found also in both Asia and Europe. Mizraim (Egypt) and Cush are often classed together by the prophets. Cush, in 2 Chron. xxi. 16, is applied to a part of Arabia.

LIBYA was an extensive district lying along the shores of the Mediterranean, originally the portion of the Lubim of the Old Testament. 2 Chron. xii. 3; xvi. 8: Nah. iii. 9. Its capital was Cyrene, founded by a Grecian colony, which gave the name of Cyrenaica to the country in which it stood. Many Jews resided here; among the earliest Christians were some of this nation. Acts xi. 20; xiii. 1. The Libyans were chiefly wanderers of the desert, or engaged as mercenaries in the service of Ethiopia and Egypt. The wilderness of Sahara is still known as the Libyan Desert.

The LUDIM sprang from Lud, the son of Mizraim. They are mentioned by several sacred writers. Isa. lxvi. 19: Jer. xlv. 9: Ezek. xxvii. 10; xxx. 5. In the Great Desert of Sahara there is found at the present day a people called Lud-aya.

In glancing the eye over the "Map of the Countries mentioned in the Bible," mingled feelings of pain and hope are awakened. In their present state, spiritual ignorance holds almost undisturbed dominion. Lands that were once trodden by pious patriarchs and holy apostles are now overshadowed by the utter darkness of heathenism, or the gross delusion of Mohammedanism. But there are great and glorious promises, which in their fulfilment shall shed unnumbered blessings on these regions of the earth. The day-spring from on high shall visit those who now sit in the shadow of death. "Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God." Ps. lxxviii. 31. "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him." Ps. xxii. 27. Then shall they look unto him who was once offered on the cross for the sin of the world, and in faith and love shall rest on him alone for salvation, while they gratefully and lovingly render to him their undivided allegiance and praise. "All kings shall bow down before him; all nations shall serve him. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. His name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed." Ps. lxxii. 8, 11, 17.

¹ Sime's Sacred Geography.

² Kitto's Biblical Cyclopedia.

No. III.

JOURNEYINGS OF THE ISRAELITES.

THE journeyings and subsistence of the children of Israel for forty years in a desert, must be classed among the most extraordinary events recorded in either profane or sacred history. Almost every stage of their route is marked by a succession of wonderful interpositions and miracles, which exhibit alike the goodness and forbearance of God toward a rebellious people, but a people of whom he had sworn unto their fathers that he would bring them into the promised land.

The Israelites had rapidly increased in the land of their bondage to six hundred thousand men, besides women and children, the whole, probably, amounting to nearly two millions. With urgent haste they took their departure from Rameses in Goshen, the same as Raameses, a city built by this people for Pharaoh. Exod. i. 11. Some ruins, about twenty-eight miles from Suez, in the valley of Abu Keisheid, are thought to point out its position. Below this place was a collection of waters, the Bitter Lakes, several miles in length, but which have been dried up for many ages. The Israelites had to pass round these lakes in their direction to the northern point of the Red Sea; for "God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near; for God said, Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, and they return to Egypt; but God led the people about, through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea." Exod. xiii. 17, 18.

They encamped the first night at Succoth, which signifies "tents," or "booths," from its being a mere halting-place for caravans. On this route, at about twelve miles N. N. E. from the present Cairo, occurs a place which is very convenient for an encampment, and where the great pilgrim caravan to Mecca awaits the arrival of the western pilgrims, previous to its final departure, and where it breaks up on its return. This has been regarded as the Suc-coth of Scripture. At the end of the second day, they arrived at the "edge of the wilderness," at Etham. They now probably would have pursued their journey eastward, but they were commanded to "turn," or remove, "to Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon, Exod. xiv. 2; which it is thought was a narrow defile, not far from the western shore of the gulf, between the mountains which skirt the sea and a small bay on the south. They were now "entangled in the land." This movement had the effect to draw Pharaoh after them, and thus to accomplish his overthrow. If they had gone straight forward into the rocky wilderness, the Egyptians could not have followed them with their chariots; but the design of God in thus altering the line of their march—and which route may have appeared foolish to the Egyptians—was revealed to Moses. Exod. xiv. 17.

The Egyptians came upon the Israelites as they were encamped before the western arm of the Red Sea. This sea is a gulf of the Indian Ocean, and many have thought that it originally connected the Mediterranean and the Arabian seas. Some geographers have placed the miraculous passage at a narrow part of the gulf, where Suez now stands, which is less than a mile in width, and is fordable at low water. Professor Ritter supposes the place of passage is to be sought higher up in the ancient bed of the sea. Another position is pointed out, to which preference is to be given, as more in harmony with the decidedly miraculous character of the event; it is lower down, some miles below Suez, near the mountain ridge of Atakah. Here the waters, according to Bruce, are about three leagues wide, and fourteen fathoms deep in the channel. It is the opinion of nearly every traveller in this region, that the extent and depth of the gulf has undergone considerable change in the course of the last three thousand years, and that much of the ancient bed has been filled up by the accumulations of sand.

The Israelites passed through the sea upon dry ground, and came out on the eastern side, near what is now called Ajun, or Ras Musa, or "the promontory of Moses." The region of country stretching from this point is the wilderness of Shur, (Exod. xv. 22,) or the wilderness of Etham, of the book of Numbers, xxxiii. 8. Both terms apply to the upper portion of the desert, extending from Egypt down the eastern shore of the Red Sea, and over to Palestine. Their first station in this wilderness was Marah, or "bitter," where the miracle of rendering bitter water sweet occurred. Exod. xv. 23-25. The spot where this event took place is considered to be the well of Howara, near the barren bed of a winter torrent, called Wady Amarah, which is the same in sound and meaning as Marah. It occurs on the customary road along the coast from Suez to Sinai. Burckhardt observes of the water of this well, that there is no other so absolutely bitter on the whole coast. Even camels, if not severely parched with thirst, refuse to drink it. Three days were occupied in travelling to this place, Section from M^t Sinai to M^t Hermon.

a distance of thirty-four miles. Their next station was Elim, "where were twelve wells of water and three-score and ten palm trees." Exod. xv. 27. The site of this place is fixed by Niebuhr and Burckhardt in the vale of Gharendel, which is the largest of all the torrent beds on the west side of the peninsula. The valley now contains many date trees, tamarisks, and acacias of different species. Water here may be obtained in abundance by digging wells; there is also a copious spring with a small rivulet. Hence it has become a principal watering-place of the Arabs. These people still show a spot held by them in great veneration, called "the bath of Moses."

The Israelites took their journey from Elim, and came unto the wilderness of Sin, "between Elim and Sinai," (Exod. xvi. 1,) at the foot of the mountainous ridge of El Tyh, a name which signifies "the wanderings." Burckhardt describes it as "a frightful desert, almost wholly destitute of vegetation." It was immediately after they had entered this desert that they obtained the miraculous supply of quails and of manna from heaven. They had wholly exhausted the food they had brought with them out of Egypt, and were now dependent upon the direct interposition of God. Dr. Robinson and others suppose that the Israelites now bore south-eastward into the Sinaitic group of mountains. Their entrance, in that case, would be through the broad valley called by the Arabs, Wady Feiran; or they may have taken a nearer course, through Wady Mukattam, "the valley of inscriptions." They were now brought to Dophkah and Alush, the sites of which stations cannot be fixed with any degree of certainty. The Wady Feiran is the most fertile in the whole region, and here we must look for Rephidim. Much interest is associated with this station. Here the Israelites were for the first time attacked by the Amalekites. Exod. xvii. 8-13. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, visited him also at Rephidim, and, by his advice, judges were appointed to assist the Jewish leader in his judicial capacity. Exod. xviii. But chiefly here amidst the lofty granite peaks was the rock which Moses smote at the command of God, and from whence issued a miraculous supply of water. The interest of which fact is increased, as the inspired Apostle Paul refers to this rock as a figure of Christ, from whom flow the streams of salvation and every blessing, saying, "They drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ." 1 Cor. x. 4.

The next encampment was in the desert of Sinai, where events of the deepest importance occurred. Here the Almighty made known his will, through the medium of Moses, to the assembled multitude. Here the decalogue was given, and the covenant made. Exod. xx. 1-17; xxiv. 7, 8. In this desert, also, the worship of the golden calf took place; the people were numbered; the tabernacle erected; Aaron and his sons consecrated; the second pass-over was celebrated; and Nadab and Abihu destroyed for offering strange fire unto the Lord.

The mountain from which the law was given is denominated Horeb, in Deuteronomy; in other books of the Pentateuch it is called Sinai. These names are now applied to two opposite summits of an isolated, oblong, and central mountain in the midst of a confused group of mountain heights. It is about two miles in length, from north to south, and about one-third of this distance in width. Horeb is the awful, frowning cliff at the northern extremity, which rises to an elevation of more than seven thousand feet above the level of the sea. A deep, irregular, and narrow defile sweeps around the entire base of this oblong mountain, which supports the heights of Horeb and Sinai. It has been asserted that there is no spot in the Sinaitic group which agrees with the description of the Scripture narrative, and where so large a host could make an encampment. Dr. Robinson, however, has satisfactorily shown that, at the foot of Horeb, there is the plain er-Rahah, which amply meets all the requirements of the history. "Here," says this learned traveller and critic, "was space enough to satisfy all the requisitions of the scriptural narrative, so far as relates to the assembling of the congregation to receive the law. Here, too, one can see the fitness of the injunction to set bounds around the mountain, that neither man nor beast might approach too near." Again, he observes, "The whole plain lay spread out beneath our feet, with the adjacent wadis and mountains; while Wady Esh-Sheikh, on the right, and the recess on the left, both connected with and opening broadly from er-Rahah, presented an area which serves nearly to double that of the plain. Our conviction was strengthened that here, or on some of the adjacent plains, was the spot where the Lord 'descended in fire,' and proclaimed the law. We gave ourselves up to the impressions of the awful scene; and read, with a feeling of awe that will never be forgotten, the sublime account of the transaction, and the commandments there promulgated, in the original words as recorded by the great Hebrew legislator."¹ Other travellers have explored a valley on the southern base of Sinai, which was shut from the view of Dr. Robinson, in his ascent, by a long ridge of rocks, and which has been found to be even greater than the valley of er-Rahah on the north. This, it is supposed by Ritter and others, may have been occupied by the Israelites at the giving of the law. Another mountain, known as the Serbal, separated from the Sinaitic group, has been selected by Lepsius and Bartlett as the locality of the "mount of God."² Whichever view we adopt, the truthfulness of the Scripture narrative is vindicated.

In the desert of Sinai the Israelites abode for rather less than one year, when the signal for them to go forward again appeared. Their marchings and encampments in all their subsequent wanderings were directed by Jehovah, their King. A cloud, in token of his presence, covered the tabernacle by day, and "at even there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire until the morning." Num. ix. 15, 16. The rising of this cloud was the signal for them to advance, as it, overhanging the tabernacle, should lead the way; and the settling of the cloud upon the tabernacle was the signal for them again to encamp.

¹ Biblical Researches, i. 89, 96, 107, edition 1856. See also Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, p. 45.

² See the grounds on which they rest their decision, in Bartlett's Forty Days in the Desert, pp. 55-60.

Doctors Wilson and Robinson suppose the Israelites to have come through a wide avenue of the Sinaitic group, known as Wady Esh-Sheikh, near their former encampment at Rephidim. This would bring them into a large plain called El Hadharah, somewhere in which was Taberah, or burnings, a name given to it from the destruction by fire from heaven, which came upon the people for their complainings. Num. x. 12; xi. 1-3. Their next station was Kibroth-hattaavah, or "the grave of lusts;" for here the people lusted for flesh, and were smitten with death while their food was in their mouths. Num. x. 34; xxxiii. 16. Dr. Wilson, in his graphic description of this part of the desert, says, "It seemed to us, by its slopes, and precipices, and hollows, and caverns, to be a striking illustration—as we often noticed among the ravines of the wilderness—of the text in which the Israelites are said to have been led 'through a land of deserts and of pits.'" Jer. ii. 6. Bartlett, also, in describing this part of the desert, says, "It is impossible to convey any idea of the feeling of utter weariness that grows upon the solitary wanderer, as day by day he penetrates farther into the heart of this great and terrible wilderness: as ravine succeeds to ravine, each more forsaken and desolate than the last, with its bed of sand or gravel, overhung with mountains, which, in their convulsed forms, their bald and awful abruptness, their arid coloring of brown, black, white, red, and yellow, ever glaring under the same fiery sun, seem like a portion of some early world untenanted by man—some blasted planet visited in the wildness of our dreams, where human foot has never trodden, and human life has neither object nor subsistence. The mind falls back upon itself, and delights to recall the events, in all their vividness, of that early period when the Israelitish host threaded these weary defiles—to represent to itself every incident of their toilsome march, and the feeling of horror and amazement that must have daunted their spirits, as they felt themselves transported from verdant Egypt into the heart of such a solitude."¹

From Kibroth the Israelites came to Hazereth, at which place the sedition of Miriam and Aaron occurred. Num. xii. Robinson, after Burckhardt, places Hazereth at a spot now called el Hudhera, where is a fountain, together with palm trees. "The determination of this point," says Robinson, "is perhaps of more importance in biblical history than would at first appear; for if this position be adopted for Hazereth, it settles at once the question as to the whole route of the Israelites between Sinai and Kadesh. It shows that they must have followed the route upon which we now were to the sea, and so along the coast to Akabah, (at the head of the eastern arm of the Red Sea,) and thence, probably, through the great Wady-el-Arabah to Kadesh. Indeed, such is the nature of the country, that having once arrived at this fountain, they could not well have varied their course so as to have kept aloof from the sea, and continued along the high plateau of the eastern desert." Dr. Wilson, whose views are adopted by Keipert, supposes the Israelites to have gone through one of two passes at the head of the mountains now known as Jebel Shakeirah, which would bring them at once upon that "great and terrible wilderness," in which the universal tradition of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans has placed their journey to Kadesh-barnea. This route, he contends, would admit of the orderly pitching of their camp, according to the Divine directions, and free them from many difficulties which the narrow coast-road presents.

Their stations in this part of the desert were Rithmah, Rimmon-parez, Libnah, and Kadesh-barnea: this last place they probably reached about June. As they were now not far from the borders of the promised land, spies were sent out to examine it, from whose evil report the people were so intimidated, and so unmindful of the promises they had received, and the Divine protection they were under, that they rebelled; for which they were sentenced to wander in the wilderness forty years. The pass up which the Israelites, after this sentence, rashly ascended to fight with the Amalekites and Canaanites, (Num. xiv. 40-45,) is extremely steep and difficult. The remains of an ancient road, formed of steps hewn in the rocks, are perceptible in many places, with ruins of a fortification at the foot and at the summit. The pathway is in a zigzag direction, and much worn.¹

The exact site of Kadesh cannot perhaps be defined. Dr. Robinson conjectures that it may have been at Ain el Weibah, a fountain at the mouth of a deep valley, leading up through the mountains to the high western desert south of Hebron. It certainly lay near the mountains of the Amorites.

The narrative in the early part of the book of Numbers goes at once from Hazereth to Kadesh; while the second account in the same book mentions other places, but which seem properly to belong to a second route, and a second visit to Kadesh. Dr. Robinson harmonizes this period of the wanderings of the Israelites thus: "I have thus far assumed that the Israelites were twice at Kadesh; and this appears from a comparison of the various accounts. They broke up from Sinai on the twentieth day of the second month, in the second year of their departure out of Egypt, corresponding to the early part of May: they came into the desert of Paran, whence spies were sent up the mountain into Palestine, 'in the time of the first ripe grapes;' and these returned after forty days to the camp at Kadesh. As grapes begin to ripen on the mountains of Judea in

¹ Forty Days in the Desert on the Track of the Israelites, p. 50.

¹ Coleman's Historical Geography of the Bible.

July, the return of the spies is to be placed in August or September. The people now murmured at the report of the spies, and received the sentence from Jehovah that their carcasses should fall in the wilderness, and their children wander in the desert forty years. They were ordered to turn back into the desert 'by the way of the Red Sea,' although it appears they abode 'many days' in Kadesh. The next notice of the Israelites is, that in the first month they came into the desert of Zin, and abode again at Kadesh. Here Miriam dies; Moses and Aaron bring water from the rock; a passage is demanded through the land of Edom, and refused; and they then journeyed from Kadesh to Mount Hor, where Aaron dies in the fortieth year of the departure from Egypt, in the first day of the fifth month, corresponding to a part of August and September. Here, then, between August of the second year and August of the fortieth year, we have an interval of thirty-eight years of wandering in the desert."¹ In this way the scriptural account of the journeyings of the Israelites becomes perfectly harmonious and intelligible. The eighteen stations mentioned only in the general list in the book of Numbers, as preceding the arrival at Kadesh, are then apparently to be referred to this eight-and-thirty years of wandering, during which the people at last approached Ezion-geber, and afterward returned northward a second time to Kadesh, in the hope of passing directly through the land of Edom. Their wanderings extended, doubtless, over the western desert, although the stations named are probably only those head-quarters where the tabernacle was pitched, and where Moses and the elders and priests encamped; while the main body of the people were scattered in various directions.² The events of this long intervening period may have been of little interest, being filled up with the ordinary incidents of pastoral life. Dr. Barth considers that the tabernacle and principal encampment remained at Ezion-geber for thirty-eight years, while the people wandered through Arabia Petræa in search of pasturage.³

In the retrograde movement of the Israelites from Kadesh-barnea, after their second visit, they probably passed down the Wady Arabah, a deeply-depressed valley, which has evidently been formed by some great convulsion to which the earth's surface has been subject at a very remote period. (See PHYSICAL MAP OF PALESTINE, No. IX.) On their way they came to Mount Hor, near Petra, where Aaron died—a mount which is "the very throne of desolation itself," consisting of "broken, shattered, and frowning heights, ruin piled upon ruin, and dark and devouring depth added unto depth."⁴ The Arabs still call it Jebel Neby Hauran, that is, "the mountain of the prophet Aaron;" and to the present day, when an eastern caravan comes in sight of its summit, a lamb is sacrificed to his memory. Arriving again at Ezion- geber, the people turned at the head of the eastern, or Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea, to enter on the great eastern desert of Arabia. At this place a large defile comes down steeply from the north-east, through the mountains, forming the main passage out of the Wady Arabah into the desert. The ascent of the Israelites was, doubtless, through this pass, when they departed from the Red Sea, and turned to "compass Edom."

At this point of their wanderings the people were "much discouraged because of the way," and murmured against God and his servant Moses. As a punishment, fiery flying serpents were sent among them, and many died; but, at the command of Jehovah, a brazen serpent was raised, and those who looked in faith were cured. This provision of mercy is referred to by our Lord Jesus Christ, as an emblem of his great work of saving sinners: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." John iii. 14, 15.

They again pursued their journey along the eastern sides of the mountains of Seir. The Edomites, who had refused them a passage through their land, now suffered them to pass unmolested along their borders, and even supplied them with provisions for their march. Deut. ii. 3-6. Nothing is known of their halting-places until they come to Zared, or "the brook," a small stream which flows through the mountains into the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. They next "removed, and pitched on the other side of Arnon, which is in the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites." Num. xxi. 13. This brought them to Beer, or Beer-elim, "the well of the princes;" where, finding that they were now nearly at the end of the wilderness, and in prospect of a speedy entrance into the promised land, they broke forth into the "song of the well." Num. xxi. 17, 18.

The Israelites next successfully encountered a formidable foe in Sihon, King of the Amorites, who dwelt at Heshbon, and whose territories extended along the shores of the Dead Sea, and up the valley east of the Jordan to the river Jabbok. A few broken pillars, several large cisterns and wells, together with extensive ruins, still mark the situation of Heshbon, twenty-one miles east of the mouth of the Jordan. These ruins overspread a high hill, commanding a wild and desolate scenery on every side. The next conquests of the Israelites were over Og, who ruled in the territories east of the Sea of Galilee, and the north-eastern portion of the valley of the Jordan.

These conquered lands and "cities of the plain," being fit for pasturage, were allotted, at their own request, to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, who had much cattle, on the condition of their assisting the other tribes in the conquest of the promised land westward of Jordan. Num. xxxii.: Deut. iii. 8-20. It was from hence the next station was called Dibon-gad, in order to distinguish it from another Dibon belonging to the Reubenites. Josh. xiii. 17. The ruins of this place, under

¹ Biblical Researches, ii. 194, ed. 1856.

² Robinson's Biblical Researches; Kitto's Biblical Cyclopedia.

³ Biblical Geography.

⁴ Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible.

the name of Diban, are shown about four miles north of the river Arnon. Thence they passed to Almon-diblothaim, or Diblath, on the edge of the wilderness of Kedemoth, from whence they proceeded to Mattanah, Nahaliel, and Bamoth, in the valley belonging to Moab, which brought them again near to the mountains of Abarim, on the east of the Jordan. They now took up their final station at Bethpeor, over against Jericho. Thus ended a journey of forty years, chiefly through deserts, which might have been accomplished in a few weeks. The direct route from Egypt to Palestine, through the desert, is now performed in omnibuses, and occupies only two or three days.

The Moabites, once a powerful people on the east of Jordan and the Dead Sea, had been driven south by the Amorites from the plains of Moab, and were at this time confined within narrow limits between the streams Zared and Arnon. They seem to have been too feeble to offer resistance to the Israelites, the males of whom were now chiefly young, or in middle life, and inured to hardship. Unable to resist their progress, and discouraged at the discomfiture of the Amorites and Bashanites, they invited Balaam to curse Israel. But their efforts to prevail by enchantment were unsuccessful, and they had recourse to temptations. In this they succeeded, and the people of Israel were seduced into impurity and idolatry. As a punishment, a terrible plague and the sword of vengeance cut off twenty-four thousand of them, even within sight of their promised rest. Moses now, by Divine command, took the census of the people from twenty years old and upwards, and found they amounted to 600,730, among whom there was not one whom Moses and Aaron had numbered in the wilderness of Sinai, except Joshua and Caleb. Num. xxvi. 65.

The work and pilgrimage of Moses were now at an end. He had brought the people, through perils and foes, to the borders of the long-desired land. Nothing was more natural than that he should earnestly desire to pass over and see it before he died. But he yields submissively to the will of God. He is directed to ascend Mount Nebo, or Pisgah, in order that he might "behold the goodly land," and then lie down and die. From the summit a large tract of Canaan was before his view. On the right lay the mountain pastures of Gilead, and the romantic district of Bashan; the windings of Jordan might be traced along its broad and level valley, till almost beneath his feet it flowed into the Dead Sea. To the north spread the luxuriant plains of Esdraelon, and the more hilly yet fruitful country of Galilee. Right opposite stood the city of Jericho, embowered in its groves of palms; beyond it the mountains of Judea, rising above each other till they reached the sea. Gazing on this magnificent prospect, beholding in prophetic anticipation his great and happy commonwealth, occupying its numerous towns and blooming fields, Moses breathed his last. The place of his burial was unknown, lest, perhaps, his followers might be tempted to ascribe Divine honors to his name, and assemble to worship at his sepulchre. But though Moses was denied an entrance into the earthly Canaan, the people of Israel, according to the faithful promise of God, were led down to the banks of the Jordan, and by his almighty power the waters were divided, and the people passed over "right against Jericho."

In these wanderings of an ancient favored race, the true believer may see various resemblances to his own pilgrimage through the earthly wilderness to the heavenly Canaan; and as the Lord fulfilled his promise of old time, so surely will he guide, protect, and finally bring all true believers to the rest of heaven.

The Map of the Journeyings of the Children of Israel has been accurately reduced by Keipert, the learned German geographer, from material furnished by Professor Robinson. The names of many of the stations are not given in the plate, as their position would be merely matter of arbitrary conjecture. Dr. Robinson¹ has given a tabular view of the stations, harmonizing the enumeration of the books of Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, which may be here appropriately given.

1. From Egypt to Sinai.

Exodus xii.-xix.

Numbers xxxiii.

- | | |
|---|---|
| From Rameses, xii. 37. | From Rameses, ver. 3. |
| 1. Succoth, xii. 37. | Succoth, 5. |
| 2. Etham, xiii. 20. | Etham, 6. |
| 3. Pi-hahiroth, xiv. 2. | Pi-hahiroth, 7. |
| 4. Passage through the Red Sea, xiv. 22; and three days' march into the desert of Shur, xv. 22. | Passage through the Red Sea, and three days' march in the Desert of Etham, 9. |
| 5. Marah, xv. 23. | Marah, 8. |
| 6. Elim, xv. 27. | Elim, 9. |
| 7. | Encampment by the Red Sea, 10. |
| 8. Desert of Sin, xvi. 1. | Desert of Sin, 11. |
| 9. | Dophkah, 12. |
| 10. | Alush, 13. |
| 11. Rephidim, xvii. 1. | Rephidim, 14. |
| 12. Desert of Sinai, xix. 1. | Desert of Sinai, 15. |

2. From Sinai to Kadesh, the second time.

Num. x.-xx.

Num. xxxiii.

- | | |
|---|------------------------------------|
| From the Desert of Sinai, x. 12. | From the Desert of Sinai, ver. 16. |
| 13. Taberah, xi. 3: Deut. ix. 22. | |
| 14. Kibroth-hattaavah, xi. 34. | Kibroth-hattaavah, 16. |
| 15. Hazeroth, xi. 35. | Hazeroth, 17. |
| 16. Kadesh, in the Desert of Paran, xii. 16; xiii. 26: Deut. i. 2, 19; hence they turn back and wander for thirty-eight years, Num. xiv. 25, seq. | |
| 17. | Rithmah, 18. |
| 18. | Rimmon-parez, 19. |
| 19. | Libnah, 20. |
| 20. | Rissah, 21. |
| 21. | Kehelathiah, 22. |
| 22. | Mount Shapher, 23. |
| 23. | Haradeh, 24. |
| 24. | Makheloth, 25. |
| 25. | Tahath, 26. |
| 26. | Tarah, 27. |
| 27. | Mithcah, 28. |
| 28. | Hashmonah, 29. |
| 29. | Moseroth, 30. |
| 30. | Bene-jaakan, 31. |
| 31. | Hor-hagidgad, 32. |
| 32. | Jotbathah, 33. |
| 33. | Ebronah, 34. |
| 34. | Ezion-geber, 35. |
| 35. Return to Kadesh, Num. xx. 1. | Kadesh, 36. |

¹ Biblical Researches, ii. 523, ed. 1856.

3. From Kadesh to the Jordan.

Num. xx. xxi.: Deut. i. ii. x.

Num. xxxiii.

From Kadesh, Num. xx. From Kadesh, ver. 37.

22.

36. Beeroth, Bene-jaakan,
Deut. x. 6.

37. Mount Hor, Num. xx. Mount Hor, 37.

22; or Mosera, Deut.

x. 6, where Aaron died.

38. Gadgodah, Deut. x. 7.

39. Jotbath, Deut. x. 7.

40. Way of the Red Sea,
Num. xxi. 4; by Elath
and Ezion-geber, Deut.
ii. 8.

41. Zalmonah, 41.

42. Punon, 42.

43. Ije-abarim, Num. xxi. 11. Ije-abarim, or Iim, 44, 45.

44. The brook Zared, Num.

xxi. 12; Deut. ii. 13, 14.

45. The brook Arnon, Num.

xxi. 13; Deut. ii. 24.

46. Dibon-gad, 45.

47. Almon-diblathaim, 46.

48. Beer in the desert, Num.

xxi. 16, 18.

50. Mattanah, xxi. 18.

51. Nahaliel, xxi. 19.

52. Bamoth, xxi. 19.

53. Pisgah, put for the range Mountains of Abarim, near of Abarim, of which to Nebo, 47.

Pisgah was part, Num.

xxi. 20.

54. By the way of Bashan to Plains of Moab by Jordan, to the plains of Moab by near Jericho, 48.

Jordan, near Jericho,

Num. xxi. 33; xxii. 1.

NO. IV.

CANAAN AS DIVIDED AMONG THE
TWELVE TRIBES.FROM THE TIME OF JOSHUA TO THE ACCESSION OF DAVID.

THE Israelites reached the land promised to Abraham their father (Gen. xii. 6, 7) about B. C. 1451. It was at that time known as the land of Canaan, a name derived from its original settler, the fourth son of Ham. Gen. x. 15-19. This region of country, so inconsiderable in its physical condition, and yet so famous in the history of the world, is, in its extreme length, only about one hundred and eighty miles from north-east to south-west. The width in the south is eighty or ninety miles, which tapers toward the north, where it scarcely exceeds twenty miles. Its boundaries varied at different times; but in general terms they may be described as the mountains of the Lebanon on the north, the Great or Mediterranean Sea on the west, Arabia on the east, and the Desert of Sin and the Dead Sea on the south. The entire boundaries, as given by Moses, (Num. xxxiv. 2-12,) and Joshua, (xiii. 15-31,) are not easily identified at the present day.

Canaan was inhabited by several warlike tribes, upon whom the curse of God rested for their idolatry and grievous sins. The Amorites chiefly inhabited around the south-western shores of the Dead Sea. The Hittites abode in the south, in the neighborhood of Hebron; the Jebusites possessed the mountains of Jerusalem and the vicinity; the Girgashites are supposed to have dwelt near the Jordan; the Hivites, in the north, about Mount Hermon; and the Perizzites south of the plain of Esdraelon. The descendants of six other of the sons of Canaan were the Sidonians, Arkites, Arvadites, Sinites, Zemarites, and Hemathites, who settled on Mount Lebanon and the regions east and west of it. The Sidonians, called by the Greeks, Phœnicians, were by far the largest division of this people, and under this name all the northern tribes were sometimes included. The Philistines, also, had settled in the land, and became numerous and powerful. They were the descendants of Mizraim, the second son of Ham. Besides these, there were the Rephaim and the Anakim: the latter were a race of gigantic highlanders, residing in the northern and southern mountains. A few of their families existed in the land so late as the time of David. 2 Sam. xxi. 16.

The term Canaanites, which signifies "merchants," was sometimes confined to the inhabitants of the north-western coast, who, from their maritime position and enterprise, had distinguished themselves in such arts of commerce as were known in the early ages. It, however, was more indiscriminately applied to the whole of the tribes inhabiting the country lying between the thirty-first and thirty-fourth degrees of north latitude. The name Perizzites, or "villagers," belonged to those who lived in the interior of the land. The united terms of Canaanites and Perizzites sometimes included the people of the whole country. Gen. xiii. 7; xxxiv. 30.

"The land of Canaan was in every way most suitable for the Israelites. The mountains and the sea, by which it was in every part enclosed, rendered it easy of defence against all invasion. It abounded in corn, oil, and fruit—in all productions and capabilities essential to settled life. Besides, this was the land which attached to itself all the memories capable of exciting the enthusiasm of such a people as the Hebrews. It was the cradle of their race. It was their historical land—the land in which their renowned forefathers fed their flocks for more than two hundred years, and which was still the country of their fathers' sepulchres."¹ But they entered the land as the ministers of the Divine justice, to remove its debased inhabitants either by death or expulsion. The patriarchs had been told by God that "the iniquity of the Canaanites was not yet full." At length it was filled to the brim; and the escaped captives from Egypt were commissioned by the God of nations to execute his judgments upon the guilty inhabitants, and to possess their country.

Joshua, the Divinely appointed leader of the Israelites, in his first campaign, reduced all the open country, and several of the towns, in the southern division of the Land of Promise. The northern powers, as far as Great Sidon and the valley of Mizpeh eastwards, except some fenced cities of the Philistines, next fell into his hands. In the sixth year, the first division of the lands took place, when the tribes of Judah, Ephraim, and half Manasseh, obtained their portions. These, added to the eastern tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, settled in the lands of the Amorites, Midianites, and Moabites, completed the settlement of five tribes. After this, the Israelites appear to have grown remiss in their exertions to take possession of the country, for Joshua thus reproved them: "How long are ye slack to go to possess the land which the Lord God of your fathers hath given you?" Josh. xviii. 3. Thus stimulated, they renewed their conquests; and, finally, the seven remaining tribes obtained their allotments, as minutely described in the 18th and 19th chapters of Joshua. After the first division of the portions of Judah, Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manasseh, it was found that there would not be enough remaining for a just allotment to the other tribes. The boundaries of the two first-named were accordingly reduced by giving to Dan, Simeon, and Benjamin their portion from the original grant to Judah and Ephraim. Several years, however, elapsed before the territory and boundaries of the tribes were determinately settled. The division thus established continued to be the only one known to the Israelites for upwards of five hundred years, until after the death of Saul. It must not be supposed, however, that they obtained entire possession of the land. On the contrary, a large portion of their early history is filled up with their conflicts with those who remained of the previous proprietors, more especially the Philistines, who remained in possession of their five lordships, namely, Gaza, Ashdod, Askalon, Gath, and Ekron. Josh. xiii. 3. According to tradition, many of the Canaanites, driven from their country, fled into North Africa, beyond Libya, and even into Abyssinia.

¹ Kitto's History of Palestine, 337.

The relative situation of the tribes will be seen on the Map. The children of Joseph were divided into two tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh, his eldest sons, who were adopted by Jacob, and were therefore admitted to equal rights with his own children. The tribe of Levi, being selected for the immediate service of God, possessed no division of the land. Thus the number of the tribes was twelve at this settlement in their new country.

According to the Divine command, the land was apportioned by lot, and according to the relative number and strength of each tribe.

LEVI, as just stated, possessed no territorial inheritance in the land; but each of the tribes, according to its size, gave to the Levites some of their cities, together with the suburbs thereof, (extending 1000 cubits from the walls each way,) for their cattle. Num. xxxv. 2-7: Josh. xiv. 3, 4. Hence they were called Levitical cities: they were in number forty-eight. The house of Aaron, or the priests, as the most eminent of all the families of the Levites, had their cities in the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. To the Kohathites were allotted twenty-three cities, (thirteen of which were properly sacerdotal, inasmuch as they were assigned to the sons of Aaron, to whom the priesthood was exclusively confined;) to the Gershonites, thirteen; and the Merarites, twelve. Six of these cities were asyla, or cities of refuge, (Num. xxxv. 6,) whither the man who had slain his fellow "unwittingly" might flee, and find an asylum from his pursuers, and be secure from the effects of private revenge till cleared by a legal process. The Israelites were commanded to "prepare a way," or make a convenient road, "that every slayer might flee thither," without impediment, and with all possible expedition. Deut. xix. 3. The rabbins inform us, that at every cross-road was set up this inscription, "Refuge! Refuge!" to guide the fugitive in his flight. "The institution," it has been observed, "was framed with a view to abate the evils which ensued from the old-established rights of the blood-avenger, and thereby to further the prevalence in the nation of a mild, gentle, and forgiving spirit." It may also be regarded as typical of the refuge which is to be found in Christ for all those who by faith flee unto him.

The tribes may here be classed according to the order of time in which they obtained possession of their territories.

REUBEN'S territory lay on the "other side" of the Jordan. It had no fixed limit on the east: in the time of Saul it extended across the wilderness to the Euphrates. 1 Chron. v. 9, 10. On the west it was bounded by the Jordan and the Dead Sea. The Reubenites were chiefly a pastoral people. The prediction, "Thou shalt not excel," was remarkably fulfilled in this tribe, as not a single individual from their number attained to eminence in the national history. The region held by them is now called Belkah, and is still celebrated for its rich pasturage. The ruins of several cities included within their borders are still visible, retaining the ancient names.

GAD possessed the whole eastern portion of the valley of the Jordan, known as the land of Gilead. This tribe was hemmed in on the east for some distance by the Ammonites, who had taken possession of the country previously occupied by the Amorites; but the Gadites had access to the wilderness at the north-eastern portion of their land. To them belonged thirteen "fenced cities," as well as "sheepfolds," or villages occupied by herdsmen and shepherds. Their country was very fertile, and well watered by the Jabbok and other smaller streams which ran through it.

MANASSEH received half of their inheritance on the north side of Ephraim, though they seem also to have possessed certain parcels of land in Issachar, Ephraim, and Asher. Josh. xvii. 7-11. Those of the tribe whose inheritance fell on the west of the Jordan, in Canaan, had a fine tract of country, in length about fifty miles, though in width not exceeding twenty, and in some parts only ten. The mountains of Gilboa and other famed localities were within its borders. Several of the judges and other ancient persons were Manassehites, and their country was the scene of many events recorded in Old Testament history. The pastoral half of the tribe was allowed to establish itself in a territory beyond the Jordan, in the kingdom of Bashan, which had been subdued by Jair. Deut. iii. 14. It was a large and undefined territory, described as "all Bashan" and "half of Gilead." Josh. xiii. 30, 31. Many of the Gentiles, however, resided in their midst, and for ages heathenism was not entirely exterminated from some of their cities.

JUDAH had the ascendancy over the other tribes of Israel, according to the prophetic blessing of the patriarch Jacob. In the lot of this tribe were one hundred and fifteen cities. Joshua xv. 21-62. They were divided into classes, as the uttermost cities, the cities in the valley, the cities in the mountains, the cities in the wilderness, or those on the shores of the Dead Sea. Some of these, toward the coast, however, as Gaza, Askelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath, were held by the Philistines, in defiance of all the assaults made to possess them by the children of Judah. The country of Judah was distinguished by numerous mountains and hills, as Zion, Moriah, and Olivet, Engedi, and Carmel, between which ran luxuriant and beautiful plains, well watered by springs and streams, and yielding large supplies of corn, fruits, and oil. The portion known as "the wilderness of Judah" was far from being a barren waste, as it afforded good pasturage to extensive flocks and herds: traces of its ancient cultivation are still visible.

EPHRAIM lay north of Benjamin and Dan. This tribe, along with that of Manasseh, had originally one portion assigned to them, as "the sons of Joseph," but which afterward was separated. Their boundary, as given in Josh. xvi. 5-8, cannot now be definitely traced. It was one of the finest and most fruitful portions of the Holy Land, and subsequently was included in the kingdom of Samaria. Several ranges of mountains intersected the land, and, among other celebrated spots, it possessed the fertile plains of Sharon. The tribe of Ephraim exerted a counterbalancing influence on Judah; and on these two the weaker tribes were to a great extent dependent. Its wealth and importance were increased from the fact of the ark being deposited in Shiloh, one of its cities; but on its removal by David to Jerusalem, the jealous spirit of Ephraim was aroused, which led to continual rivalry and alienation between these two strong tribes, and prepared the way for the revolt of the ten tribes, of which Ephraim was the most distinguished, in the days of Rehoboam.

BENJAMIN occupied a strip of land between Judah and Ephraim. To this position the prophecy of Moses may refer: "He shall dwell between his shoulders," Deut. xxxiii. 12; for his inheritance was situate between those of the two strongest and most warlike of the tribes of Israel. It included between its limits Bethel, Gibeon, Jerusalem, and Jericho; though Jerusalem, as the capital of the whole community, was regarded rather as belonging to the entire nation, than the possession of a single tribe. Its territory extended, at its greatest length, to thirty-four, and its breadth to twenty miles. Though it had no streams of note, it was well supplied with water from wells and springs, which tended to fertilize the land. This tribe had the honor of giving the first king to Israel, in the person of Saul, the son of Kish; and Saul of Tarsus, the most eminent preacher of the gospel to the Gentiles.

ZEBULUN possessed a small but very fruitful district, in the north of the land. On the east it included part of the shores of the Sea of Chinnereth, (See Matt. iv. 13;) and on the west it touched on the Mediterranean, by means of Carmel, part of which mountain was assigned to it; thus was fulfilled the prophet's declaration, "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea." Gen. xlix. 13. Its most distinguished city was Nazareth. The inhabitants of this district were highly favored in beholding the miracles and hearing the gracious teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ; and from among them the greater part of his apostles were selected.

ISSACHAR possessed the beautiful valley of Jezreel, the mountains Tabor, Little Hermon, and Gilboa, and several rich plains bordering on the Jordan. The extent of its territory was about forty-seven miles in length, and twenty-six in breadth. In its centre were portions which belonged to the half-tribe of Manasseh. Josephus attests that the heritage of this tribe "was fruitful to admiration, abounding in pastures and nurseries of all kinds, so that it would make any man in love with husbandry." The people were distinguished for their patient industry and agricultural pursuits; to which the prophetic words of Jacob point. Gen. xlix. 14, 15. They were, however, able in time of war to number sixty-four thousand men; and their cities were also numerous and populous.

ASHER occupied the north-western part of the land, from Carmel to near Sidon in Phœnicia: the tribe of Zebulun was on the south, and Naphtali on the east. It possessed a great extent of maritime country; hence it is said, "Asher continued on the sea-shore, and abode in his breaches," or creeks. Judges v. 17. Tyre and Sidon, and other Phœnician cities, have been generally included in its boundaries, but upon insufficient grounds. The Asherites were unable for some time to obtain possession of their territories, but "dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land," who still retained seven cities assigned to this tribe. Judges i. 31, 32. The whole district was well watered by streams that flowed from the Lebanon and other neighboring mountains.

NAPHTALI was bounded on the west by Asher, and on the east by the Jordan and the region of Argob, which is called in Josh. xix. 34, "Judah upon Jordan," because Jair, who conquered it, was related to the tribe of Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 22, 23. It was about thirty miles in length, and twenty in breadth, although it probably extended its southern limits beyond that river. The land was fertile and beautifully diversified with hill and valley: at the present day it is better cultivated than any other district in Palestine. Modern Jews resort to this district, more especially to the town of Saphet, where they have a famous rabbinical college.

DAN had the smallest portion in the distribution of Canaan, being about eighteen miles from east to west, and twenty-four from north to south. It lay on the west of Benjamin and Judah, and extended to the Mediterranean through the country of the Philistines. The Danites do not appear to have expelled the original inhabitants, in consequence of which the province soon became too small for their accommodation. In the time of the judges, accordingly, six hundred families of this tribe emigrated northward, and attacking the city of Laish, near Mount Lebanon, subdued it, and changed its name to Dan. Judges xviii. The proximity of this tribe to the Philistines on the sea-coast will explain several circumstances in the history of Samson, who was a Danite. The country yielded great quantities of grain, and most delicious fruits.

SIMEON received "a divided inheritance" in Judah, as eighteen cities belonging to this people lay within the southern portion of the country of the latter tribe, Josh. xix. 2-9; but they at length were dissevered from Judah, and their country formed the most southern portion of the Holy Land. The desert of Bezer and several other tracts belonging to this territory were unfit for cultivation, but other portions were generally fertile. As the Simeonites chiefly led a pastoral life, they pastured their flocks around in all directions, as far as the neighboring tribes would permit them. 1 Chron. iv. 28, 39-41. Some of them placed themselves as far south as Mount Seir in the days of Hezekiah. The tribe contained 59,800 able-bodied men on coming out of Egypt, Numb. i. 23; but when numbered on the plains of Moab, previous to entering Canaan, they were only 22,000: a decrease in the course of one generation which can only be accounted for by the supposition that they were more extensively corrupted by the affair at Peor, and fell more fatally under the righteous judgments of God. Num. xxv., xxvi.

The final division of the land was made at Shiloh, which Joshua had chosen as a central position, where he set up the Tabernacle, depositing therein the ark of the covenant. Here it continued more than four hundred years, until taken by the Philistines in the days of Eli. After the death of the great Jewish captain, the children of Israel ceased their exterminating warfare with the Canaanites, and contented themselves with making them vassals. They even proceeded to contract marriages with them, and thus were inveigled into the vices and idolatry of heathenism, which brought upon them the marked displeasure of God.

No. V.

THE KINGDOM OF DAVID AND SOLOMON.

DURING the government of the judges, the Israelites established themselves more firmly in Canaan; though, as before mentioned, they ceased their exterminating warfare with the inhabitants, and contented themselves in making them vassals. Saul, the first king of Israel, pushed his conquests beyond Jordan, and overcame several neighboring tribes and nations, especially those ancient foes of the Hebrews, the Amalekites, who had been judicially doomed to destruction. Exod. xvii. 14: Deut. xxv. 18. But Saul was himself defeated and slain by the Philistines in the valley of Jezreel.

David, at the beginning of his reign, fixed the seat of his government at Hebron; but about 1049 B. C. he took Jerusalem from the Jebusites, which thenceforward became the capital of the kingdom. This prince, desirous of completing the reduction of the original inhabitants of the land, first turned his arms westward against the Philistines, whom he subdued, taking from them Gath and its territory. 2 Sam. viii. 1: 1 Chron. xviii. 1. He next turned eastward, and overcame the Moabites beyond Jordan, and rendered them tributary. 2 Sam. viii. 2. From thence he proceeded northward, and subdued the Syrians of Zobah and Damascus, extending his conquests to the Euphrates, thus realizing the promise made to Abraham. Gen. xv. 18: 2 Sam. viii. 3-10. While David was engaged in these victories, his valiant captain, Abishai, defeated the Edomites in the "Valley of Salt," at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, and then pressed his victorious arms into the mountains and rocky wildernesses of Mount Seir, leaving garrisons to secure the advantages he had gained. In this subjection of the families of Esau to that of Jacob were fulfilled the prophetic declarations of Gen. xxv. 23; xxvii. 29, 40: Num. xxiv. 18: 1 Chron. xviii. 12, 13: 2 Sam. viii. 14. This was the most important accession which the Hebrew territories received, inasmuch as it gave them the command of one of the arms of the Red Sea and the port of Ezion-geber; from which, in the following reign, in conjunction with the Phœnicians, those expeditions were made to Ophir and Tarshish which imported into Judea the various productions of foreign lands. 1 Kings x: 2-18.

Solomon, at the age of twenty, ascended the throne of his father, 1030 B. C., and inherited an empire extending from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates, and from the mountains of Lebanon to the Red Sea, 1 Kings iv. 21, including a population of about 5,000,000. The northern boundary of his dominions has been recently satisfactorily determined by the discovery of the site of Tiphseh, (which signifies "a passing over the ford,") the border town on "this side the river" (Euphrates.) 1 Kings iv. 24. This monarch made a new division of the land, separating it into twelve provinces or governments, placing each under a viceroy or lieutenant. The names of these, and also of the districts over which they presided, are found in 1 Kings iv. 7-19. To secure the trade of the Indian Ocean and the distant country of Ophir, Solomon built two cities on the Akabah, the eastern arm of the Red Sea. A large pile of ruins is supposed to mark Elath, one of these places.

In addition to the nations that were tributary to Solomon, others were in friendly alliance; and their kings, desirous of benefiting by his wisdom or his powerful support, cultivated his friendship by bringing "every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and raiment, harness, and spices, horses and mules, a rate year by year." 2 Chron. ix. 24.

Note

The Tent Cities of the Decapolis in Itinerary against the Maccabees are underlined

PALESTINE

(SYRIA)

under the Maccabees and the Roman Princes & Illustrative of the Period of CHRIST and the APOSTLES.

Jahn calculates that the number of Canaanites yet in the land was from 400,000 to 500,000, who were not only tributary to Solomon, but rendered him laborious service which he could not impose on his own people. "Peace gave to all his subjects prosperity. The trade which he introduced brought wealth into the country, and promoted the sciences and arts, which there found an active protector in the king, who was himself distinguished for his wisdom. The building of the Temple and of several palaces introduced foreign artists, by whom the Hebrews were instructed. Many foreigners, and even sovereign princes, were attracted to Jerusalem, in order to converse with the prosperous royal sage. The regular progress of business, the arrangements for security from foreign and domestic enemies, the army, the palaces, the royal household, the good order in the administration and in the service of the court, excited as much admiration as the wisdom and learning of the viceroy of Jehovah."¹

Thus "the Lord magnified Solomon exceedingly in the sight of all Israel, and bestowed upon him such royal majesty as had not been on any king before him in Israel." 1 Chron. xxix. 25.

The boundaries of the tribes and their mode of government by their princes remained unaltered through the reign of David, and partially so during the time of Solomon; but after the division of the kingdom in the reign of Rehoboam, the authority of the princes was gradually merged in that of the kings. The precise boundaries between the kingdoms of Judah and Israel in the days of Rehoboam, when ten of the tribes revolted, and established a kingdom under the latter name, have not been satisfactorily determined. The impolitic and imperious conduct of the son of Solomon deprived him of three-fourths of the dominions of his father. The relative strength of the two kingdoms, however, was more equally divided, as Judah became far more densely populated, in consequence of large numbers of the Levites and the pious from among the other tribes, who, refusing to countenance the idolatries of Jeroboam, settled in this part of the land. The capital of Israel was at first Shechem, (1 Kings xii. 25,) then Tirzah, (xiv. 17; xv. 33,) which continued to be such till the reign of Omri, who purchased the hill of Samaria, and constituted it the seat of government. Judah, though much smaller than Israel, continued her national existence one hundred and thirty-four years longer; but, at last, on account of her sins, she received the same condign punishment as her sister kingdom, in fulfilment of the words of Moses and the prophets.

One important spot in this map is "Tadmor in the wilderness," founded by Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 18, and which is known to the Arabs at the present day by the same name. The situation of this once famous city is in a small oasis of the Syrian desert, abundantly supplied with pure water, which renders it probable that it was a place of resort to caravans travelling from the east to Phœnicia and Asia Minor. The Hebrew name of this city signifies a palm-tree: hence the Greeks called it Palmyra, "the city of palms." It is probable that it did not remain long in the possession of the Hebrews after the death of Solomon, though it flourished for ages, a magnificent city in the midst of a solitary desert. Its ruins, which are of an age subsequent to the times of its royal founder, show that it was of considerable extent. The usual approach to them is from the west, through a valley of about two miles in length, at the termination of which thousands of Corinthian columns, of white marble, burst, upon the traveller's sight in all their desolate grandeur. "So numerous are these," it has been said, "that the spectator is at a loss to connect or arrange them in any order or symmetry, or to conceive what purpose or design they could have answered." The wretched hovels of a poor tribe of Arabs now occupy the court of the once splendid Temple of the Sun.

The names of those Canaanitish nations, which, scattered among the Israelites, maintained a partial independence till the reign of Solomon, are inserted in the map.

No. VI.

PALESTINE,

UNDER THE MACCABÆAN AND IDUMÆAN PRINCES, AND ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE PERIOD OF CHRIST AND HIS APOSTLES.

THE land of Canaan varied in its political divisions at different periods of its history. Under the administration of Joshua it was arranged in tribal cantons; during the reign of Solomon it was formed into provinces; in the days of his successors it was divided into two kingdoms; and when our Lord was on the earth it was subdivided into tetrarchies of four presidencies, the whole being tributary to the Romans. These tetrarchies were Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and Peræa. The first three were included in Palestine proper; the last embraced the territory beyond the Jordan. There was also a fifth division, Idumæa, part of which, however, lay out of the borders of Canaan, or Palestine.

Palestine, signifying "the land of the wanderer," was an early name of the country of the Philistines. Exod. xv. 14: Isa. xiv. 29. Strictly it belonged only to the strip of land bordering on the Mediterranean; but Philo and Josephus use the word to designate the country of the Jews generally; and hence it became a common appellation, employed alike by Greeks and Romans, Christians and Mohammedans.

JUDEA.

Judea was the most southern portion of the country. The Jewish captives who returned to their own land were chiefly of the tribe of Judah. They spread over the original territories of Judah, Benjamin, and Dan, and gave the name of Judea to this portion of the land of their fathers; and the people themselves were from that time no longer called Hebrews or Israelites, but Judæi, or Jews. Josephus thus describes this portion: "The southern parts, if they be measured lengthwise, are bounded by a village adjoining the confines of Arabia, called by the Jews who dwell there, Jordan; and its northern limit, where it joins Samaria, is the village Annath, also called Borceos: its breadth, however, is extended from the river Jordan to Joppa, on the shore of the Mediterranean. The city of Jerusalem is situated in the very middle, on which account some have, with sagacity enough, called that city the navel of the country. Nor is Judea destitute of such delicacies as come from the sea, since its maritime places extend as far as Ptolemais. It was divided into eleven portions, of which the royal city of Jerusalem was the chief; and ruled over the neighboring country as the head over the body. As for the other cities which were inferior to it, they presided over their several provinces. Gophna was the second of them; Acrabatta was the next; after them, Thamna, Lydda, Emmaus, Palla, Idumæa, Engedi, Herodium, and Jericho; and after these came Jamnia and Joppa, as presiding over the neighboring people." From the Mishna, it appears that this division was considered under four aspects; namely, the western, which lay along the Mediterranean; the mountainous, or pastoral district; the plain, which lay farther east, and inclined toward Jordan; and the vale, or flat, which bordered on the banks of that river. The whole of this province was often denominated the "south country," because it lay southward of Samaria.

¹ Jahn's Hebrew Commonwealth.

The eastern part of this land formed what is called in Scripture the desert, or the wilderness of Judea. It ranged along the slopes of the mountains which constituted the western cliffs of the Dead Sea. This tract of country is sixty-five miles in length, and ten in breadth. At the present day a considerable portion of it is a stony and barren district; but the parts farthest from the sea have numerous inhabitants, and afford good pasturage to large flocks and herds. Here are the remains of many ancient sites, which were visited by Dr. Robinson, whose well-directed labors were rewarded by the discovery of the localities of several places mentioned in Scripture. The hill country, or "the mountains of Judea," consist of a number of precipitous ridges, interspersed with numerous small valleys, well watered by brooks and rivulets. It forms a broad table-land, about thirty miles in length, and seven in breadth; and its round, steep hills, long ridges, and verdant plains, present a constantly diversified and picturesque scene. Its mountains, being about midway between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea, afford some beautiful and extensive views of the country. The villages of Judea were generally built on the tops of hills; and now, as in ancient times, the female peasants are seen carrying on their shoulders the water, contained in earthen pitchers, procured from the fountains at the base of the mountains.

Judea, at the death of Herod the Great, was assigned to his son Archelaus, (Matt. ii. 22,) who, after reigning nine years, was deposed by the Romans, and banished to Gaul. Judea was now entirely reduced to a Roman province. The sceptre had departed, for Shiloh had now come, according to the prediction uttered by the patriarch Jacob. Gen. xlix. 10. Syria was placed by its heathen masters under the government of a proconsul, Publius Quirinus, (the Cyrenius of Luke ii. 2,) who resided at Cæsarea. Under the proconsul were procurators; one of whom, Pontius Pilate, was appointed to the charge of Judea about A. D. 26, and was stationed at Jerusalem with a cohort of soldiers under his command. His oppressive conduct led to his loss of office and disgrace at the end of ten years.

SAMARIA.

Samaria was the smallest of the tetrarchies: it comprehended the original possessions of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. Josephus describes its general features in the following terms: "It is entirely of the same nature as Judea, for both countries are made up of hills and valleys, are moist enough for agriculture, and are very fertile. They have abundance of trees, and are full of autumnal fruit, both that which grows wild and that which is the result of cultivation. They are naturally watered by many streams, but derive their chief moisture from rain-water, preserved in reservoirs during the dry season, of which they have no want; and as for those streams which they have, their waters are exceeding sweet. By reason also of the excellent grass which they have, their cattle yield more milk than those in other places; and, what is the greatest sign of excellency and abundance, they each of them are very full of people."

There was no natural boundary between the provinces of Judea and Samaria. After the Israelites were carried away captive to Assyria, their conquerors planted colonies from Babylon, Hamath, and other heathen places, who introduced their idolatrous practices. These people mingled with the poor and feeble Samaritans left in the land, and a system of religion was introduced in which the worship of idols was associated with that of the true God. On the return of the Jews, an inveterate enmity sprang up between the two races, and they would have no "dealings" one with the other. John iv. 9. Continual conflicts took place, and the Jews, being the stronger party, made encroachments on the Samaritan boundaries, which accordingly varied at different periods.

The chief cities of the province were Samaria, Sychar, and Shiloh. The valleys are generally deep ravines, much narrower and steeper than those of Judea. One of the chief is that of Shechem, through which a brook continually flows. The plain of Sharon is a district of country lying along the Mediterranean between Joppa and Carmel. In the Scriptures this name is applied only to that part of the great level which lies north of Joppa, but it was afterwards extended to a wider range. The southern part of the plain is verdant and fruitful: in the spring of the year it is adorned with an extraordinary variety of beautiful flowers. But where Solomon's herds once pastured in peace, the wolf and other wild animals now abound; and where the husbandman once sat under his own vine and fig tree, in the midst of well-cultivated fields, "none daring to make him afraid," the poor modern Arab never goes forth to plough without a gun on his back, and then sows only as much grain as will serve for his own scanty support, lest he should provoke the exactions of his jealous and oppressive rulers.

The length of Samaria, from north to south, was reckoned a three days' journey. Hence, says Josephus, "it is absolutely necessary for those who would go quickly to Jerusalem (from Galilee) to pass through that country." And hence there was a natural if not a moral reason that our Lord "must needs go through Samaria" to Jerusalem, as recorded in John iv. 4.

The gospel was preached to the Samaritans by Philip, and the first Christian Church out of Jerusalem was formed in the city of Samaria, within one year of our Lord's death, Acts viii.; but heresy was soon introduced by Simon Magus. An adulterated form of Christianity appears to have existed among them from that time to the present day. "They were," says Gibbon, "an ambiguous sect: rejected as Jews by the Pagans, by the Jews as schismatics, and by the Christians as idolaters."

GALILEE.

This was the most northerly division of Palestine, and contained the original portions of Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, Asher, and parts of the tribes of Dan, and the eastern half-tribe of Manasseh. It was the most extensive tetrarchy of the Holy Land. The limits of Galilee have been thus defined by Josephus: "It is terminated west by Ptolemais and Carmel, which do not belong to Galilee; on the south by the country of Samaria and Scythopolis, on the river Jordan; on the east by the cantons of Hippos, Gadara, and Gaulan; on the north by the confines of the Tyrians." After the Jews were carried into captivity, various Gentile tribes migrated into this division of the land, and formed settlements. They afterwards intermarried with the Jews. The country being destitute of natural barriers, was also more open to the aggressions of the Tyrians and neighboring heathen nations than other parts of the land; hence it was called Galilee, or "district," (that is, "of the Gentiles.") This fact also accounts for the low estimate in which the Galileans were held by the Jews, who imagined that nothing good could come out of Galilee. John i. 46; vii. 52. The language of the inhabitants became so corrupted by their intercourse with foreigners that they could be distinguished from the Jews by their speech. Matt. xxvi. 73; Mark xiv. 70.

Galilee was divided into Upper and Lower. Upper, or Northern, Galilee was sometimes called "the coasts of Tyre and Sidon," from its proximity to those cities. It was a hilly country, with deep, fruitful valleys. Lower, or Southern, Galilee was the territory occupied by Issachar in the early days of Israel, and included the celebrated plain of Esdraelon, which is nearly fifty miles in length and twenty in breadth. Dr. Wells remarks of this province, that it was more honored with our Saviour's presence than any other: hence he was called a Galilean. "The immense population of Galilee, indeed, afforded numerous opportunities to our Redeemer of preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing the diseased, among whom he spent the greater part of his time while he tabernacled upon earth. To this province also he commanded his apostles to repair and converse with him after his resurrection, Matt. xxviii. 7, 16; and of this country the greater part, if not all, of the apostles were natives, on which account they are styled by the angels 'men of Galilee.'" Acts i. 11.¹ Josephus, himself a Galilean, describes his countrymen as a brave, high-spirited, and industrious people, though they were at the same time very turbulent, and used to be foremost in all the insurrections against the Romans.

The principal cities of this province were Cæsarea Palestina, Tiberias, Capernaum, Chorazin, Bethsaida, Cana, Nazareth, and Nain. It contained, according to Josephus, one hundred and four cities and towns, the least of which numbered fifteen thousand inhabitants; but the correctness of this account may be justly questioned. In the present day the whole region is almost deserted, though it is still beautiful even in its desolation. No boat now moves upon its sea, and no net is cast into its waters. The fields that were formerly cultivated are now covered with thorns and thistles; the walls of the terraces along the hill have fallen down; the rain has washed away the soil from the rocks; and the groves of palm trees have disappeared.

Pompey the Great first brought this province under the Roman sway, about 61 B. C. On the death of Herod the Great, it formed one of the tetrarchies into which his dominions were divided, and was given to his son, Herod Antipas. Luke iii. 1.

PERÆA.

Peræa means "the land on the other side," and was applied at an early period to a part of the region formerly known as the lands of Gilead and Bashan, originally the country of the Ammonites. It once abounded with palm trees, vines, and olives, and was well watered with springs and torrents from the mountains. At the present day, though this district is almost desolate, travellers speak of it with expressions of delight. It possesses a mild climate and a fruitful soil. Its principal city was Gadara, and the region adjacent was known as the country of the Gadarenes. Mark v. 1-17. The remainder of the land of Bashan, not included in Peræa, was formed into several divisions, the exact position and limits of which cannot in each case be ascertained. Abilene was the most northern of these, and derived its name from Abylæ, or Abel, which probably signifies "a grassy spot." The inhabitants of the country called it Nebi-Abel, that is, "the prophet Abel," from the belief that Cain here buried his murdered brother. When the Romans made themselves masters of Western Asia, this district became subject to them, and the native rulers were made their vassals.

¹ Simes's Geography.

Iturea, which probably corresponded to the old Geshur, was peopled by Jetur, the son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 15: 1 Chron. i. 31; the inhabitants were distinguished for their skill in the bow, and their predatory habits.

Trachonitis derived its name from two mountains, called by the Greeks Trachones. It was included in the tetrarchy or dominion of Philip, the son of Herod the Great. Luke iii. 1. The immense cavities of the mountains in this district, which were known to Strabo, are to this day secure retreats for marauders.¹

Gaulonitis received its name from Gaulon, or Golan, the chief city of ancient Bashan. The remains of some of its cities show that they were places of considerable strength and importance, and well adapted to resist, as they did, the armies of the warlike Romans.

Batanæa, in the time of the Romans, was the southern portion of the ancient kingdom of Bashan, and was noted for its high hills, stately oaks, rich pastures, and excellent cattle. Its more modern name does not occur in the Scriptures.

Auranitis, or Hauran, is a beautiful hilly district, covered with luxuriant pasture-ground, forming an agreeable contrast to the dreary wilderness which adjoins it. It produces the finest wheat in Syria. It is sometimes noticed by writers as identical with Trachonitis. During the period of its subjection to the Roman power it was densely inhabited; and the ruins of its ancient villages still afford commodious habitations for the present inhabitants in their migrations over the land. Decapolis, mentioned in the Gospel, is so called from its containing ten principal cities, scattered through an extensive region. Geographers are not agreed as to their names and sites; but they are generally considered to be Scythopolis, (or Bethshan,) Hippo, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia, (formerly Rabbath,) Dium, Gerasa, Raphana, Canatha, and perhaps Damascus. In this region our Lord preached, and wrought many miracles. Matt. iv. 25. Pella is said to have been the place to which the Christians of Jerusalem fled, in obedience to our Lord's direction, at the commencement of the siege of that city.

IDUMÆA.

Idumæa, as a district of Palestine, must not be confounded with the Idumæa of the Old Testament: the latter was in Arabia Petræa, while the former was that part of Judea which originally constituted the inheritance of Simeon, and which was inhabited principally by descendants of the ancient Edomites. They had settled there without opposition, while the Jews were in captivity in Babylon, having been driven from their own country by the violence of war. The Jews on their return were too weak to repossess themselves of the lands of their fathers, and the Edomites, or Idumæans, as they were then called, continued to dwell in the southern border. At length, however, a little more than a hundred years before the coming of Christ, John Hyrcanus, the great Jewish commander, conquered them completely, and compelled them either to leave the country, or to embrace the Jewish faith. They chose to change their religion, rather than relinquish their lands and return into the wilderness; and accordingly from that time they became a part of the Jewish nation. Still, that division of the country in which they lived continued to be called Idumæa, and the people Idumæans, (Mark iii. 8,) for several centuries after the Christian era.

MODERN PALESTINE.

Syria remained a province of the Roman empire until its conquest by the followers of Mohammed, A. D. 633-638; from which period it was subject to the Saracens, until the establishment, by the crusaders, of the Latin kingdom, 1099. This kingdom was destroyed by Saladin, 1187, and the crusaders were finally expelled, 1291; from which time Syria continued subject to the sovereigns of Egypt, until the conquest of both countries by Selim I., 1517, when they were brought under the Turkish sway. About this latter period Palestine was divided into five provinces; namely, Palestine, Hauran, Al Ghut, Emessa, and Kinnarin. More recently it has been divided into pashalics, the greater part of Palestine being comprehended within the pashalic of Damascus.

Considerable progress has been made in our knowledge of the modern geography of Palestine, during the present generation. The industrious researches of men of learning and enterprise have been directed to a thorough investigation of the land. Many hitherto doubtful sites have been settled, several geographical problems have been solved, and interesting descriptions have cast much light on the sacred narrative. Indeed, every fresh account has brought instruction to the Christian mind, and supplied illustrations of the sacred Scripture.¹ All travellers agree in their statements in regard to the evidence of the former fertility of the land, and its present depressed and desolate state. "The more I see of Palestine," says Dr. Paxton, "the more I am persuaded that it was once one of the first countries of the world. The time was, I doubt not, when all its rocks were covered with a fine vegetable mould." "Even in those parts where all is now desolate," says Dr. Robinson, "there are everywhere traces of the hand of the men of other days." "The numerous prophecies concerning Canaan," says another traveller, "have been so literally fulfilled, that they may be used as actual history. It is now under the curse of God, and its general barrenness is in full accordance with prophetic denunciation." "The desolation of the land," says Lady F. Egerton, "predicted in the Bible, has been brought about by those political events which are fast causing the depopulation of the country; it now no longer numbers men

¹ Rosenmüller's Handbook of Bible Geography.

¹ For a description of Palestine, as it now appears, see Dr. Kitto's "Land of Promise."

Note,
Roman Empire & Colonies
Colored

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, &
NEW TESTAMENT.

Traced to show the
Travels of the Apostles
& the remaining books of the
New Testament.

20

25

Longitude East from Greenwich.

30

35

40

sufficient to till the ground, nor can the people raise funds adequate for the purpose. Thus does man, unwittingly, bring about the unerring decrees of God."¹ Whether this land shall again be inhabited by the descendants of Abraham, as a pious and prosperous nation, and whether its fields, which have lain fallow for more than sixteen hundred years, shall again teem with fruitfulness and plenty, as the result of their labors, are questions which have excited great interest in the minds of Christians in every age.

NO. VII.

THE JOURNEYS OF THE APOSTLE PAUL;
AND THE SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA.

ASIA MINOR is the name given by ancient geographers to the large peninsula lying between the Black, Ægean, and the Mediterranean Seas. It includes many countries associated with the early history of Christianity, and claims particular attention as the principal scene of the labors of the apostle Paul. During the progress of ages, it has fallen under the sovereignty of the various great empires which have successively arisen. At the division of the kingdom of Alexander the Great, it was assigned to Seleucus Nicator. One of his successors, Antiochus, in the year 200 B. C., removed thousands of Jewish families from Mesopotamia to Asia Minor, in order that the warlike and turbulent tribes of that region might be civilized through their influence. The descendants of these Jews were called "the dispersed among the Gentiles," John vii. 35, and "Grecians," Acts vi. 1.

At an early date, the whole western coast of Asia Minor was known as Ionia; in the time of the Roman empire this region was called Proconsular Asia, while the term Ionia was applied only to the interior parts of the country. Modern Greece was called Achaia in the times of the apostle Paul, (Acts xviii. 27: Rom. xvi. 5: 2 Cor. xi. 10,) having Corinth for its capital, (2 Cor. i. 1,) which was the residence of a proconsul, (Acts xviii. 12.)

St. Paul's first missionary journey was undertaken A. D. 45. Barnabas and his nephew, John Mark, accompanied him in this apostolic progress: the latter, however, after a time, shrunk from the toils and dangers of the mission, and returned to Jerusalem. Seleucia, from whence they set sail, is the port to Antioch, at the mouth of the river Orontes. Thence their course was to the isle of Cyprus, in the Mediterranean, where at Salamis, one of its cities, they preached the gospel to the people. Passing through the island, they came to Paphos, where they met with Elymas, the sorcerer, and Sergius Paulus, the governor. About this time Saul's name was changed to Paul, the reason of which change is uncertain. Sailing from this island, they came to Perga, in Pamphylia, a province of Lesser Asia, then onward to Antioch, in Pisidia, where the apostles preached to the idolatrous inhabitants with great success, but were expelled from the city through the influence of the Jews. They now proceeded to Iconium, about one hundred miles in the interior, but had again to experience the rage of the Jews: driven out by persecution, they came to Lystra, where a cripple was miraculously healed, and then went forward to Derbe. After preaching the gospel there, they retraced their steps through Lystra and Iconium, passed into Pisidia, Pamphylia, Perga, and Attalia, and from thence by sea to Antioch, in Syria. The whole tour is calculated to have extended to nearly fourteen hundred miles, and to have occupied one year and a half.

During the long time—not less than three years—that Paul and Barnabas abode with the disciples at Antioch, it seems highly probable, if not demonstrably true, that they made a journey to Jerusalem and returned previous to setting out on their second tour. Gal. ii. 1–10.¹ The object of this visit was to consult the apostles and elders upon the question, which certain converts from Judaism had raised in the church at Antioch, whether it were necessary that proselytes from heathenism should be circumcised.

Second missionary journey. On the return of this deputation to Antioch, Paul proposed to Barnabas to undertake a second tour, and visit the churches they had formed during their first journey. They were unable to come to an agreement as to who should accompany them, and Paul, taking with him Silas, entered upon his journey without his former companion. The range of country traversed was far more extensive than on the first occasion. The apostle proceeded by land round the north-east coast of the Mediterranean, through Cilicia, his native country, to Derbe and Lystra, where he was joined by Timothy. His course was now into the large and populous province of Phrygia, in which district was the celebrated city of Colossæ. From this place he entered Galatia, in which country Neander considers that he had the remarkable vision, accompanied by the "thorn in the flesh," to which he refers in 2 Cor. xii. 1–10. Avoiding Asia, strictly so called, he went by a circuitous course to Philadelphia, Sardis, and Thyatira, and came to Troas, from which place, where he was joined by Luke, the physician and evangelist, he was divinely directed in a vision to cross the Hellespont into Macedonia. Landing at Neapolis, he passed on to Philippi, one of the chief cities of that region, where Lydia and the Philippian jailer were converted, and the foundation of a church was laid, which stands forth as the most pure of all the apostolic churches. He next passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia to Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia; but from whence he was driven by an uproar of the Jews to Berea. Here Paul was for some time favorably received by the Jews, until a party from Thessalonica followed him and aroused their malice against him. After some vicissitudes of missionary life, he arrived at Athens, where his spirit was stirred within him on observing the whole city immersed in idolatry, and he addressed the Grecian philosophers on Mars' Hill on the folly of their superstitions and the character of the only true God. On leaving Athens, Paul went to Corinth, where he abode for a year and a half, supporting himself by working at his trade of a tentmaker. At the end of this time, finding himself still opposed by the resident Jews, he proceeded homeward, calling at Ephesus and Cæsarea, and from thence overland to Jerusalem, which made the fourth visit to that city since his conversion. After a brief stay, he hastened to Antioch, in Syria, after an absence of two years and a half, where he joined Barnabas and other fellow-laborers in the work of the Lord.

¹ Journal of a Tour in the Holy Land.¹ Tate's Continuous History of St. Paul, p. 23.

Third missionary journey. The third tour of the apostle was begun by visiting the churches of Galatia, Phrygia, and Ephesus. At the latter place he remained for nearly three years, and preached with such remarkable success as to provoke the wrath of those engaged in the worship of the goddess Diana: at the instigation of Demetrius, who enjoyed a lucrative trade in the manufacture of silver images of the idol and of the heathen temple, he was compelled hastily to depart. On leaving Ephesus, he went, by way of Troas, on a second visit to Philippi. Thence he passed through the parts about Illyricum, on the eastern shore of the Adriatic Sea; then back to Corinth; but finding his enemies among the Jews were lying in wait to assault him as he returned to Syria, he changed his plan, and once more visited Macedonia, and also Troas, at which latter place he raised Eutychus to life. Having invited the elders of the church of Ephesus to meet him at Miletus, he took of them a solemn and affectionate farewell. Thence he sailed toward Syria, calling at Troas and Ptolemais. On his arrival at Jerusalem, he was violently seized in the temple, under the false charge of introducing a Gentile into the sacred precincts, and was conveyed as a prisoner to Cæsarea for safety. In this city he was brought before Felix. After lingering there for two years as a prisoner, and after repeated examinations before Felix and Festus, and King Agrippa, the last of the Herod family, Paul was conveyed to the imperial city of Rome to prosecute his appeal before Cæsar.

Voyage to Rome. The apostle Paul was placed, along with other prisoners, under the charge of a centurion named Julius, who embarked with them at Cæsarea. After touching at Sidon, they were forced by contrary winds to pass to the north of the island of Cyprus. Favored, as they probably were, by the land-breezes and currents, they arrived at Myra in Lycia, then a flourishing seaport, now a desolate waste. The centurion here found a ship of Alexandria, loaded, as we afterwards learn, with wheat, bound for Italy, in which he embarked the prisoners. Proceeding slowly on their voyage, and with adverse winds, they came to Cnidus, a small town on the south-western promontory of Asia Minor. They now changed their course, crossing over to the island of Crete, and put in at Fair Havens—a small, insecure roadstead, near the centre of the southern coast of this island. It was the month of October, a season when ancient mariners considered navigation to be increasingly hazardous; it was accordingly determined, though against the advice of the apostle, to attempt to reach Phenice, a more secure winter harbor on the same coast. A moderate breeze from the south having sprung up, they weighed anchor, cleared the harbor, and had every prospect of reaching their destination in a few hours. Sudden changes of wind, however, are very common in these seas; and a typhoon¹ arose, which drove the ship before it, toward the small neighboring island of Clauda. Fearing that the gale would force them on a lee shore, they lightened the ship and lowered their sails. The ship now became unmanageable, and was driven about in the Adriatic Sea for about fourteen days; neither sun nor stars were observed, and all hope of being saved was at an end. An ancient ship, without being able to make celestial observations, and without the compass, had no means of keeping a reckoning. The danger was therefore imminent: the crew were exhausted by long endurance, labor, and abstinence. Probably the storm had destroyed their provisions, or at least had prevented their cooking them. The ship, with nearly three hundred souls on board, was every moment in danger of foundering. At length it was borne toward land, and was run on shore at "a place where two seas met," to avoid being forced upon the breakers. The traditional locality of this shipwreck is the island of Melita, the Malta of modern geography, and which recent careful investigation has proved to be correct. St. Paul's Bay, the scene of this disaster, is a deep inlet on the north side of the island. The ship, it is supposed, was driven on the west side of the bay, which is rocky, but which has two creeks, near which it shortly went to pieces.² The shipwrecked party remained for three months on the island, and several miraculous cures were wrought by the apostle. A ship which had wintered at Melita was engaged to convey them on their voyage. They first sailed to the large and beautiful city of Syracuse, the principal place in the island of Sicily, and from thence to Rhegium and Puteoli, seaports in Italy. At the latter place, which is sixty miles from Rome, the apostle tarried with Christian brethren for seven days. At Appii Forum he was met by believers from Rome, who had come out forty-three miles to comfort and encourage him on his way. At another station, the Three Taverns, (tabernæ, houses for the sale of food,) more Roman brethren came to him, by whom he was much refreshed. From this place he was carried to the imperial city, and put into secure custody as a prisoner. After a short time, he was permitted to reside in his own hired house, guarded by a single soldier, to whom he was probably chained—a mode of securing prisoners in common use among the Romans.

¹ The Euroclydon, or typhoon, is a tempest accompanied by the agitation and whirling motion of the clouds, caused by the meeting of opposite currents of air, and the raising of the sea in columns of spray. Modern navigators in these seas call it the Michaelmas blast. Pliny, in describing the effects of sudden blasts, says that they cause a vortex, which is called "typhoon" and Gellius, in his account of a storm at sea, notices "frequent whirlwinds, and the dreaded appearances in the clouds which they call typhoons."—Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul.

² The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul. By James Smith, Esq., F.R.S. 1848.

The fourth and last journey to Jerusalem, and return to Rome. After two years' imprisonment, the apostle of the Gentiles obtained his release; the particulars of which, and the whole of his future course, lie beyond the period to which the Acts of the Apostles brings up his history. Our knowledge of his progress can be gleaned only by occasional allusions in his several epistles written after that time. It is supposed that he embarked from Brundisium, the port from whence the Romans mostly sailed for Greece and Syria, in company with Timothy and Titus. On the way, Timothy was sent to Philippi; and Paul passed by way of Crete (where he left Titus) toward Jerusalem, landing at Cæsarea. In his epistle to the Hebrews, (xiii. 23,) which was written from Rome, he had expressed his hope of soon again visiting Palestine. From Palestine he set out on his last tour, and visited Colossæ, Philippi, Ephesus, and other cities, the scenes of his former labors, and then passed on to Rome by way of Rhegium.¹ In the summer of A.D. 65, he was again a prisoner in the imperial city; from whence, in the prospect of a violent death, he wrote that sublime and pathetic expression of his confidence in the faithfulness of his Divine Master, which is contained in his second epistle to Timothy: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." 2 Tim. iv. 6-8. He suffered martyrdom in the spring of the following year.

THE SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA.

A short general view of the ancient condition of these churches, with the present appearance of their sites, may appropriately follow the account of the journeys of the apostle Paul.

EPHESUS (Rev. ii. 1-7) was a place of much renown. It became the centre of the labors of St. Paul, and the chief seat of Christianity in Asia Minor. The church here formed was at its commencement in a state of considerable prosperity; but "the candlestick" has long since been removed. Only a few Greek peasants, living in extreme poverty, are met with among groups of splendid ruins; the chief ruins being those of the theatre, memorable for a tumult, described Acts xix. 21-41. Travellers have sought for the remains of the famous temple of Diana, one of the seven wonders of the world, and which was two hundred years in building. Of its one hundred and twenty-seven magnificent marble pillars, not one can now be found. The mysteries of Diana were connected with the arts of magic; and Ephesus was the chief seat of Jewish and heathen witchcraft, (Acts xix. 19,) to which some think the apostle alluded when he enjoined the believers to put on the whole armor of God, that they might resist "the wiles of the devil." Eph. vi. 11.

SMYRNA (Rev. ii. 8-11) lies at the head of a deep bay, about fifty miles from Ephesus. In the earliest ages this city was of great commercial importance, and is the only one of the seven cities which retains its former prosperity. Its situation is favorable to trade; it is now one of the largest towns in the Turkish empire, and contains a population of 134,000, of whom 25,000 are members of the Greek and other eastern churches, which retain a corrupt form of Christianity. Smyrna was the residence of Polycarp, the disciple of John. He was burned alive A. D. 166. When required to revile Christ, the venerable martyr exclaimed, "Eighty and six years have I served Christ, and he has never done me the least wrong; how, then, can I blaspheme my King and Saviour?"

PERGAMOS (Rev. ii. 12-17) was the capital of Hellespontic Mysia, and situate on the north bank of the Caius, about twenty miles from the sea. Its ancient importance may be inferred from its possessing a library of 200,000 volumes, which Antony removed to Egypt and presented to Queen Cleopatra. It was also famed for its serpent or devil-worship. "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is." At the present day it retains some remnant of its ancient importance under the name of Bergamo. The modern town consists of small and mean houses, among which appear the remains of early Christian churches, "like vast fortresses amidst barracks of wood."

THYATIRA (Rev. ii. 18-29) was built upon a fertile plain, on the banks of the river Lycus, between Pergamos and Sardis. It still exists under the Turkish name of Ak-hissar, or "the white castle;" but it is very deficient in ancient remains, while its modern buildings, for the most part, consist of mud and earth. Its inhabitants are still noted for their skill in dyeing purple or scarlet cloth. Lydia, a seller of purple, was a native of this city. Acts xvi. 14, 15, 40. Many nominal Christians are found here. But "the works, and charity, and service, and faith, and patience of this faithful church," says Dr. Coleman, "have no longer any memorial on earth, except the commendation contained in the epistle to the angel of the church in Thyatira."

SARDIS (Rev. iii. 1-6,) once the capital of the kingdom of the wealthy Cræsus, and one of the most celebrated cities of the East, is now a miserable village, under the modified name of Sart. It was about sixty miles from Ephesus, at the foot of Mount Tmolus, and on the bank of the river Pactolus, renowned for its golden sands. "The ruins of the city bear witness that the Lord has come upon it as 'a thief in the night;' all its glory has passed away. The black tents of the wandering Turcomans are scattered through the beautiful valley; the whistle of the camel-driver now resounds in the deserted palace of Cræsus, and the song of the lonely thrush is heard from the walls of the old Christian church. Schubert found there only two Christian millers, in 1836, who spoke nothing but Turkish."¹

¹ Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, with Birk's Horæ Apostolicæ; Tate's Continuous History of St. Paul.

¹ Barth's Biblical Geography, p. 340.
1149

PHILADELPHIA (Rev. iii. 7-13) was situate about twenty-five miles south-east of Sardis, upon a part of the range of Mount Tmolus, and commanding a magnificent view. At this spot there are still to be seen the relics of a noble city, running up the sides of an irregular hill, called by the Turks Allah Shehr, "the beautiful city," or "the city of God." Among the ruins are four strong marble pillars, which once supported the dome of a Christian church. One solitary pillar of high antiquity has been often noticed, as reminding the beholder of the remarkable words in the Apocalyptic message to the church at Philadelphia: "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God." It is estimated that about one thousand Greek and Armenian Christians reside in the miserably built houses of the modern town, who have Divine service every Sunday in five churches.

LAODICEA. (Rev. iii. 14-22.) There were four cities of this name: two in Asia Minor and two in Syria. The Laodicea of the Revelation was on the confines of Lydia and Phrygia, about forty miles east from Ephesus. There is not one of the cities of the seven churches of which the overthrow has been so severe and the desolation so entire as Laodicea. It is a heap of ruins, abandoned entirely to the owl and the fox: its remains testify alike to its former grandeur and to the displeasure of the Almighty at the departure of its once celebrated church from the faith. "Laodicea," says a recent traveller, "is even more solitary than Ephesus; for the latter has the prospect of the rolling sea, or of a whitening sail, to enliven its decay, while the former sits in widowed loneliness: its walls are grass-grown, its temples desolate, its very name has perished. We preferred hastening on to a further delay in that melancholy spot, where every thing whispered desolation, and where the very wind that swept impetuously through the valley sounded like the fiendish laugh of Time exulting over the destruction of man and his proudest monuments."¹

The contrast of the present wretched condition of the seven cities of Asia Minor with their former privileges and prosperous state cannot but awaken feelings of sadness and sympathy. They once enjoyed the light of the gospel; they are now nearly shrouded in spiritual darkness, or in a state of ruin and desolation. The Divine judgments have overtaken them, and they stand forth as impressive instances of the abuse of the day of visitation. "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

NO. VIII.

JERUSALEM AND ITS ENVIRONS.

ANCIENT JERUSALEM.—Jerusalem is celebrated in sacred poetry as "the holy city," "the joy of the whole earth," and, as its name imports, "the habitation of peace." Its history is identified with the dearest interests of mankind as the spot where for ages Jehovah manifested his peculiar presence, where the Son of God was offered on the cross as a propitiation for sin, and from whence went forth that gospel which is to enlighten and bless all the nations of the earth.

The word Jerusalem is supposed to be derived from the Hebrew jerush, which signifies "possession," and shalem, or salem, "peace." Professor Lee, however, considers it to come from Jebus-shalem, that is, "the treading down of peace," a name appropriate, as he considers, to the warlike character of its early inhabitants.

There is no evidence that Jerusalem was an inhabited site in the days of the patriarchs, though it is generally considered to be the Salem of Melchizedek.¹ There is no doubt, however, that it was the spot to which Abraham came for the purpose of offering his only son, Isaac, in obedience to the command of God. It may be therefore inferred that a portion of it was then a secluded district, and well suited to the design of the patriarch. The whole of the cluster of mountains on which the city was afterward built was, in Abraham's days, known as Moriah, or "vision," as they could be seen from some distance, and commanded an extensive prospect, especially on the south. Gen. xxii. 2, 4. This mountain range afterward came into the possession of the Jebusites, who erected a fortress on Mount Zion, and called it Jebus, after the name of their forefather, the son of Canaan. During the days of Isaac and Jacob, and the sojourn of their descendants in Egypt, the Canaanites rapidly increased to a multitude of people; and many of their cities were built where the patriarchs had formerly fed their flocks, among which cities was probably Jerusalem. On the coming up of the Israelites from the wilderness, it appears on the page of history as a place of some importance. Josh. x. 1-4. Joshua, in the first year of his arrival in Canaan, defeated Adonibezek, king of Jerusalem, and twenty-five years afterward the children of Judah attacked and burned the city. Josh. x. 2: Judges i. 8. This latter event, however, must refer only to the lower city, as it is immediately afterward stated that the Benjamites, to whom the place was allotted, "did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem, but the Jebusites dwelt with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem," Judges i. 21, until David took possession of the city. 2 Sam. v. 6-8. Even after that time some of the original inhabitants were permitted to hold their lands, as we find David purchasing of Araunah, a Jebusite, the ground upon which the Temple was afterward erected. 2 Sam. xxiv. 18-24.

Jerusalem now became known as "the city of David;" and was the metropolis of the kingdom. All Hebrew strangers, from whatever part of the country they came, had the privilege of the rights of hospitality; to which custom our Lord may allude in Matt. xxvi. 18. Solomon enlarged the city, enriched it by costly structures, and surrounded it by a wall (Millo.) He also erected a noble causeway, or terrace, over the valley lying between Zion and Moriah, whereby the passage from his palace to the Temple was rendered more convenient. Another building, called "the House of Millo," probably because placed on or near the wall, may have been used as a state-house, or city-hall, and employed also as an armory and fortress in times of war.

¹ There was another Salem in the valley of the Jordan, and a third near Sychem. See Ancient Jerusalem, by Dr Kitto.

¹ Quoted in Professor Stuart's Apocalypse, ii. 45.

When Jerusalem became the capital of the kingdom, and the chosen place for the worship of Jehovah, every means were used to render it impregnable by high walls, massive gates, and towers. Jotham, Hezekiah, and Manasseh engaged in the erection of these defences with much zeal. This last king, it is stated, built "a wall without the City of David, on the west side of Gihon, even to the entering in at the fish-gate, and compassed about Ophel, and raised it up to a very great height." 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. With this exception, the successors of Solomon did not materially add to the strength or beauty of the place.

After numerous vicissitudes, the city was completely overthrown by Nebuchadnezzar, and the inhabitants carried into captivity. On the return of the Jews in the days of Ezra, the Temple was rebuilt on the old site; but the walls were not restored until some time after, by Nehemiah. His description of the portions of the work is interesting, though few of their localities can now be assigned. Ophel, the quarter of the Nethinim, or servants of the Temple, was again enclosed; and "the city was large and great, but the people were few therein, and the houses were not builded." Neh. vii. 4. The state of Jerusalem from the times of Nehemiah to the days of Herod the Great cannot now be traced, though probably it underwent but little change.

Josephus is the highest authority we possess for ascertaining the form and limits of the ancient Jewish capital. He says: "The city was built on two hills, which are opposite to each other, having a valley to divide them asunder; at which valley the corresponding rows of houses on both hills terminate. Of these hills, that which contains the upper city is much higher, and in length more direct. Accordingly it was called 'the citadel,' by King David; he was the father of that Solomon who built this Temple at the first; but it is by us called 'the upper market-place.' But the other hill, which is called Acra, and sustains the lower city, is of the shape of the moon when she is horned. Over against this there was a third hill, but naturally lower than Acra, and parted formerly from the other by a broad valley. In the time when the Asmoneans reigned, they filled up that valley with earth, and had a mind to join the city to the Temple. They then took off part of the height of Acra, and reduced it to a less elevation than it was before, that the Temple might be superior to it. Now, 'the Valley of the Cheesemongers,' as it was called, was that which distinguished the hill of the upper city from that of the lower, and extended as far as Siloam; for that is the name of a fountain which hath sweet water in it, and this in great plenty also. But on the outsides these hills are surrounded by deep valleys, and, by reason of the precipices belonging to them on both sides, are everywhere impassable. . . . As the city grew more populous, it gradually crept beyond its old limits, and those parts of it that stood northward of the Temple, and joined that hill to the city, made it considerably larger, and occasioned that hill, which is in number the fourth, and is called Bezetha, to be inhabited also. It lies over against the tower Antonia, but is divided from it by a deep valley, which was dug on purpose. This new-built part of the city was called Bezetha in our language, which, if interpreted in the Grecian language, may be called 'the new city.'"

Jerusalem, in the time of the Jewish historians, was fortified by three walls, except where the abrupt ravines encircling it rendered only one necessary. The first or most ancient wall began at the tower of Hippicus, running round the heights of Mount Zion, along the ridge of the valley of Hinnom, across the Tyropæon, by the pool of Siloam, as far up the valley of Jehoshaphat as the modern well of the Virgin, whence it ascended to the eastern corner of the Temple. From Hippicus it descended, on the other hand, along the ridge of the Tyropæon, separating Zion from Acra, down to the western cloisters of the Temple; it then was continued along the edge of the valley, down to Hinnom, near Siloam, forming, in fact, the original wall of Mount Zion before Acra was added. Thus this wall enclosed the whole of the city as it existed in the times of David and Solomon. The course of the second wall has been subjected to more controversy than any other point of the topography of the city. The Jewish historian describes it as starting from the gate Genath, apparently near the tower of Hippicus, and encircling the northern quarter of the city, as far as the castle of Antonia. The division thus enclosed communicated with the Temple by flights of steps and causeways. It was doubtless the chief seat of business, as in the present day. Here were crowded together the narrow streets of the various craftsmen, among which streets many of the soldiers of Titus were entangled and slain. On the eastern part of this wall were two towers, Hananeel¹ and Meah.² They were square, twenty ells above the wall, and two hundred yards apart. It was without this wall, probably on the northern side, that the crucifixion of our Lord took place. Keipert and others commence the western wall from near the gate of Ephraim, and bring it in a direct line southward, thus limiting Acra, and placing the traditional Golgotha outside the walls. The Roman lines of circumvallation, together with the camp of Titus, are thus also brought to a spot which, according to Dr. Thenius's plan, is within the city. (See the Map.) The third, or outer wall, did not exist in the time of Christ, but was built shortly after by Agrippa, to enclose a populous suburb which had extended itself to the north: it was not completed with the strength the builder originally designed. It commenced also at the tower of Hippicus, and ran northward to the tower of Psephinus on the extreme west. It thence swept round east, and then south, to the old wall in the valley of Kidron. The tower of Antonia is placed by Josephus at a short distance from the north-west corner of the Temple area, and described as standing on a rock, exactly answering to the present site of the governor's house. It was strong and capacious, communicating with the outer court of the Temple, and divided by a deep trench from the suburb of Bezetha on the north.¹

¹ Jer. xxxi. 38: Zech. xiv. 10.

² Neh. iii. 1; xii. 89.

Several stones in the ancient wall, on the Tyropœon side, have obtained much attention from recent travellers. They are in three courses, and are evidently the springing-stones of a large arch. Their size is enormous, one being twenty and a half feet long, another twenty-four and a half, and the rest in like proportion. These are referred by Bartlett to the time of Herod; but Robinson and Olin conjecture that they are as old as the days of Solomon, probably forming a part of the viaduct with which he connected his palace with the Temple. "Not a hundred yards farther" from these mighty relics, "to the north, is a spot, immediately under the wall, and quite concealed from observation, where the Jews have purchased permission from the Turks to approach the boundary of the Temple, to wail over the desolation of Judah, and implore the mercy and forgiveness of their God."²

In the original wall, constructed at the rebuilding of the city, were ten GATES. There is some difficulty in assigning them to their respective positions. The following arrangement is chiefly from Raumer:—On the north side. 1. The Old gate, at the north-east corner.³ 2. The gate of Ephraim, or Benjamin.⁴ This gate derived its name from its leading to the territories of these tribes; and Dr. Robinson supposes it may be represented by some traces of ruins which he found on the site of the present gate of Damascus. 3. The Corner gate;⁵ probably the same as the tower of the Furnaces.⁶ On the west side. 4. The Valley gate, over against the Dragon fountain of Gihon,⁷ near the north-west corner of Zion. On the south side. 5. The Dung gate,⁸ (probably identical with "the gate between two walls,"⁹) so called because of the refuse of the beasts retained for sacrifice being carried through it from the Temple. 6. The gate of the Fountain,¹⁰ near to the pool of Siloah. On the east side. 7. The Water gate,¹¹ near which the water used in the Temple was emptied into the Kidron. 8. The Horse, otherwise the Prison gate,¹² near the Temple. 9. The Sheep gate,¹³ supposed to have been so called from the victims intended for sacrifice being led through it. 10. The Fish gate,¹⁴ on the north-east, may be that through which the supplies of fish were brought from the sea-coast. The whole compass of the city, according to Josephus, was rather more than four miles.

The TOWERS of Jerusalem are noticed in Scripture,¹ and may also be referred to under the term "bulwark."² Josephus describes that of Hippicus, which existed in the time of Christ. It was erected by Herod the Great, who gave to it the name of a friend who had been slain in battle. The whole height was, about a hundred and forty feet. Dr. Robinson and Raumer point out the foundations of a tower near the modern Jaffa gate as those that probably belonged to this erection. The tower of Psephinus was built after the time of our Lord, by Herod Agrippa. It was of an octagonal form, a hundred and twenty feet high. It stood upon a high swell of the ground, and formed a landmark to a considerable distance of country. The castle of Antonia was built by John Hyrcanus, and repaired by Herod. Here a garrison was stationed, after Palestine became a Roman province, to watch the proceedings of the Jews in the Temple, which building it overawed, and with which it communicated by secret passages. The interior of this castle was probably the Pretorium, or judgment-hall; and in front of it was the "Pavement," where Pilate pronounced sentence on our Saviour.³ Beside these, there were the towers of Meah and Hananeel, already noticed, and numerous others along the whole line of defence.

No particular STREET in Jerusalem is mentioned in Scripture, excepting the bakers' street.⁴ From this expression, and from Neh. iii. 32, it would seem that, in the ancient city, as in most oriental towns at the present day, men of the same occupation inhabited the same quarter. Josephus mentions the "street of the cheesemongers." The word translated "street" in two passages⁵ properly signifies open spaces around the gates.

The PALACE of Solomon, called "the house of the forest of Lebanon," on account of the multitude of cedars used in its erection, stood on Mount Zion. On the same hill, in later times, stood the palace of Herod, a magnificent edifice, which was destroyed, with the other public buildings, by the Romans.

RESERVOIRS and POOLS were constructed in different parts of the city and its neighborhood. This was the more necessary as the whole region in which Jerusalem stood was destitute of any great running stream, and the rivulets were dry during the greater part of the year. The remains found in the present day show the extensive arrangements made for an ample supply of this necessary of life. A large tank in the lower city is attributed to Hezekiah, who "made a pool and a conduit, and brought water into the city." 2 Kings xx. 20. It is evidently of great antiquity. An aqueduct brought a copious stream from Solomon's pools, near Etham, to the Temple, which supplied the waters necessary for the ceremonial services; and it still serves for the same purpose to the Mosque of Omar. The pool commonly known to travellers as that of Bethesda is a long excavation. It is now nearly filled with rubbish, and probably has not contained any water for centuries. At the north end of this basin are two unequal arches, forming a covered way, which are conjectured to be the remains of the "five porches" that gave shelter to the "impotent folk" while waiting for the "troubling of the water." The pool of Siloam, or Shiloah, lay at the extremity of the Tyropoeon valley, near the foot of Mount Zion. Its water now issues from a rock, twenty-five feet below the ground, to which there is a descent by steps. Here it flows out, clear as crystal, and winds its way several rods under the mountain; then makes its appearance as a gurgling, refreshing rill, and takes its way south-eastward down the valley, answering to the description, "the waters of Shiloah that go softly." Isa. viii. 6. It has been ascertained by the persevering labors of Dr. Robinson, that the stream descends to this pool from the fountain of the Virgin, higher up the valley, by means of a channel cut through the rocky hill of Ophel. To this pool of Siloam our Lord sent a blind man to wash, for the recovery of his sight by miraculous power. John ix. 7. The fountain of the Virgin is so called from the notion that the Virgin Mary here washed the clothes of her blessed Son. Its waters are intermitting: "sometimes the bottom of the basin is bare and nearly dry, when suddenly the water reappears, flowing in with a strong current, and rising rapidly to the height of several feet."¹ There is historical and other evidence which goes to establish the fact that there is a great reservoir at a considerable depth below, where the Temple court was situated, more abundantly supplied formerly than at present, and that from thence are subterranean channels, which once largely supplied the waters to several fountains and reservoirs.² The fountain of Nehemiah, as it is called by Christians, but by the natives, the fountain of Job, is about fifty rods below the pool of Siloam. It measures one hundred and twenty-five feet in depth, though the water seldom rises to more than half that height. It is apparently of great antiquity: there can be little doubt that it is identical with the En-rogel of 2 Sam. xvii. 17: 1 Kings i. 9. In ancient times the upper and lower pools of Gihon also yielded considerable supplies of water: they are now in a ruinous state, and quite dry. The latter of these pools is supposed by some to be the Dragon well of Nehemiah, before the Valley gate, Neh. ii. 13; though generally this is referred to the fountain of the Virgin.

¹ Bartlett's Walks about Jerusalem, pp. 30, 36.—² Ibid. p. 141.—³ Neh. iii. 6; xii. 39.—⁴ Jer. xxxviii. 7; Neh. xii. 9; 2 Chron. xxv. 23.—⁵ 2 Chron. xxvi. 9; Zech. xiv. 10.—⁶ Neh. iii. 11; xii. 38.—⁷ Neh. ii. 13; iii. 13; 2 Chron. xxxi. 4.—⁸ Neh. ii. 13; iii. 31.—⁹ 2 Kings xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4.—¹⁰ Neh. ii. 14; iii. 15.—¹¹ Neh. iii. 26.—¹² Neh. iii. 28; xii. 39.—¹³ Neh. iii. 1; xii. 39.—¹⁴ Neh. iii. 3; Zeph. i. 10.

¹ 2 Chron. xxvi. 9, 15; Ps. xlviii. 12.—² Ps. xlviii. 13.—³ John xviii. 28; xix. 9.—⁴ Jer. xxxvii. 21.—⁵ 2 Chron. xxxii. 6; Neh. viii. 1, 3.

It is very difficult to decide as to most of the particular localities of the ancient city. The present surface of the ground is, in many parts, covered to a great depth with the accumulated ruins of ages. As an instance of this, it may be stated, that a few years since, when seeking a foundation for a Protestant church on Mount Zion, superincumbent rubbish to the depth of twenty-five feet was dug through before reaching the solid rock.³ The Jerusalem of sacred history is, in fact, no more. Not a monument or vestige of the capital of David and Solomon exists, if we except the foundation-stones already noticed.

MODERN JERUSALEM.—"Were a person," says Mr. Joliffe, "placed blindfold in the centre of Jerusalem, or any of the hills which overlook the city, nothing perhaps would exceed his astonishment on the sudden removal of his bandage. From the centre of the neighboring elevations, he would see a wild, rugged, mountainous desert—no herds depasturing on the summit, no forests clothing the acclivities, no water flowing through the valleys; but one rude scene of melancholy waste, in the midst of which the ancient glory of Judea bows her head in widowed desolation. On entering the town, the magic of her name and all his earliest associations would suffer a still greater violence, and expose him to still stronger disappointment. No 'streets of palaces and walks of state,' no high-raised arches of triumph, no fountains to cool the air, or porticoes to exclude the sun; no single vestige to announce its former military greatness or commercial opulence; but, in the place of these, he would find himself encompassed on every side by walls of rude masonry, the dull uniformity of which is only broken by the occasional protrusion of a small grated window."

All travellers agree in their representations of the impressions produced by the first view of the holy city, so singular in situation and sacred in hallowed associations; as they also do in the feelings of disappointment on becoming familiar with its streets and dwellings. For, beautiful as Jerusalem appears in the distance, the illusion is dissipated on entering the gates. As the stranger traverses the irregular and almost forsaken streets, meanness, misery, and filth appear on every side. Very few, if any, of the streets bear names among the native population. Some are a succession of arched avenues; in others the opposite houses nearly meet at the top, or a canopy of old mats and planks is placed across, and so low as scarcely to allow an equestrian to pass beneath them. The footpaths are only partially paved, and, in many instances, are as rugged and as steep as a mountain road, and so narrow that two loaded camels can with difficulty pass one another. The few shops have a dirty and desolate appearance: the only signs of business are at the bazaars, if we except the sale of beads, crosses, and other objects of superstitious regard, which are purchased by the pilgrims who annually resort to the city. The outside of the private houses, though strongly built of limestone, are exceedingly mean, more particularly those in the Jewish quarter, with their narrow windows, masked and guarded with iron bars toward the street, and wooden casements within. Nor do the insides of these dwellings remove the disagreeable sensations made by the exterior. "A large number of houses in Jerusalem are in a dilapidated and ruinous state. Nobody seems to make repairs so long as his dwelling does not absolutely refuse him shelter and safety. If one room tumble about his ears, he removes into another, and permits rubbish and vermin to accumulate as they will in the deserted halls. Tottering staircases are propped to prevent their fall; and when the edifice becomes untenable, the occupant seeks another a little less ruinous, leaving the wreck to a smaller or more wretched family, or more probably to a goatherd and his flock. Habitations which have a very respectable appearance as seen from the street, are often found, upon entering them, to be little better than heaps of ruins."¹ "Throughout the whole place there is not one symptom of either commerce, comfort, or happiness."² "Under Turkish rule, no one dreams of finding regulations and appliances for the convenience or safety of the public. No lamp-posts, no water-pipes, no names of streets, no numbered houses, no drains or sewers, no scavengers but dogs and jackals, no coaches or carriers' carts. Everybody is expected to provide for himself."³ "At every step you are reminded of that prophecy, 'Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles.'"⁴ And now, "destitute of any interest but that connected with the past, the traveller gladly hastens from the dullness and misery within her walls to the lonely hills around, where there is nothing to disturb the picture of the momentous events brought before him by his imagination."⁵

¹ Dr. Olin's Travels.

² Kitt's Modern Jerusalem.

³ Dr. Olin's Travels, ii., 264.

Jerusalem is now universally called Kouds by the Mohammedans, which signifies "holy." The city that now is appears of an irregular shape. It is surrounded by a high embattled wall, which is generally of a compact limestone. It has six gates, one of which looks to the west, and is called the gate of Bethlehem, because the road to this place passes through it. On the north are the gates of Damascus and Herod; the latter is now closed. On the east, leading to the valley of Jehoshaphat and the Mount of Olives, is St. Stephen's gate, near which, it is said, the proto-martyr was stoned to death. On the same side is the Golden gate, filled up with solid masonry, and "flanked by a tower, on which a Mohammedan soldier is constantly on guard; for the Turks have a tradition that by this gate the Christians will one day enter and obtain possession of the city."⁶ Looking to the south is Zion gate, or the gate of the prophet David: it is nearly opposite to the mosque built over the supposed site of the tomb of the royal psalmist.

Most travellers get their first view of Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives, which lies within half a mile east of the city walls. Standing on a part of the brow of the hill which is traditionally said to be the spot on which our Lord stood when he beheld the city and wept over it, the whole of Jerusalem spreads out to the sight like a map, every considerable edifice and almost every house being visible. The whole is as an inclined plane, sloping gently from east to west, and indented by a slight depression nearly through the centre in the same direction, and seems as though built on one continuous hill, standing out singly from the midst of the surrounding mountains. The vast assemblage of domes and turrets which adorn the roofs of the convents, churches, and houses, gives to the place an external air of grandeur: of these domes none seem more splendid than that of the mosque which has usurped the place of the ancient Temple.

Among the public edifices is the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, built over the traditional site of Calvary. The locality of the crucifixion, however, is strongly contested. Some writers favor the claims of this spot chiefly on the ground that the early Christians must have well known the real Calvary at the time when Constantine erected the original Church of the Holy Sepulchre; while some, on the other hand, urge the topographical difficulty that this site is now far within the walls, and that it cannot be shown that it was ever otherwise than within the city, whereas we are distinctly taught that Christ "suffered without the gate." Heb. xiii. 12.

"The ascent to the [traditional] Mount of Calvary is by a staircase cut in the rock; its form is almost entirely disfigured by marble and decorations. The holes of the crosses, evidently spurious, are beneath; and there is a fissure in the rock, said to have been produced by the earthquake. These contrivances tend both to produce disgust and to weaken our faith in the locality."⁷ It is at times the scene of most disgraceful conflicts between the adherents of the Latin and Greek Churches, and to the scandal of religion, even in the judgment of Jews and Turks. The "place called Calvary" is sometimes assigned, though very arbitrarily, to the outside of the second wall, on Mount Bezetha.

The Mosque of Omar, with its extensive area, verdant lawn, and groups of olive and cypress trees, is the most handsome object in modern Jerusalem. It occupies nearly one-eighth of the whole city. This splendid Turkish sanctuary occupies the site of the Temple of Solomon; but it is forbidden ground to both Jew and Christian. Beneath the platform of the mosque are some concealed crypts, supposed to be part of the original basement laid on Mount Moriah, on which to rear the lofty groundwork of the "house of the Lord."

The citadel and the great Armenian convent occupy that part of Mount Zion included within the present walls. The citadel lies on the northern brow of the hill. It encloses within its ancient outworks a portion of the celebrated tower of Hippicus, which was saved, at the command of Titus, from sharing in the general destruction of the city. Between the citadel and the Armenian convent is the Protestant Episcopal church of St. James. On the outside of the wall is a mosque which is said by the Mohammedans to be built over the grave of David. Another part of the hill is occupied by some small convents, and the remainder of Zion has become a ploughed field.⁸ Dr. Rae Wilson and Dr. Clarke found part of it laid out as arable land, and the ploughmen actually at work, turn-

¹ Kitto's History of Modern Jerusalem.

² Sir F. Henniker's Journey.

³ Dr. Rae Wilson's Travels in the Holy Land.

⁴ Rev. J. Jowett's Christian Researches.

⁵ Bartlett's Walks about Jerusalem.

⁶ Stephens's Incidents of Travel.

⁷ This question is well discussed in Tent Life in the Holy Land, by Wm. C. Prime, who assigns good reasons for recognizing the traditional sites of the crucifixion, etc., as the true localities.

⁸ Bartlett's Walks about Jerusalem.

⁸ Micah iii. 12

ing up the soil of the spot which in ancient days was covered with houses. The Rev. R. Herschell saw a crop of barley growing on the mountain.

The Jewish quarter adjoins the rugged slopes of Zion: "here their wretched and ruinous habitations are crowded together without the slightest regard to cleanliness or comfort." They number five thousand individuals, and possess several synagogues. The Armenians live round their convent; and the Greeks and Roman Catholics have their houses near to Calvary. The Turks and Arabs chiefly occupy the more airy and open district of Bezetha, and also have their dwellings scattered in every quarter. The petty political intrigues of these various classes "constitute the only life in the holy city. Each of them hates and despises the others, and would willingly be rid of them, unless, indeed, they can be made a source of profit." The total population is about fifteen thousand. In addition to this number, there is a Turkish garrison of eight hundred men, and at the time of Easter a great influx of pilgrims. The Jews bury on Olivet, the Mohammedans on Moriah, and the Christians on Zion.

ENVIRONS.—"Mountains are round about Jerusalem." Ps. cxxv. 2. The Mount of Olives, or Olivet, so celebrated both in the Old and New Testaments, rises on the east of the city. It is three hundred feet above Moriah, and towers one hundred feet above the highest point in the city. It is two miles in length, and stretches from north to south. It rises with considerable steepness over against the city. On its eastern side is the town of Bethany, where the Saviour found a temporary home in the house of pious and devoted friends. Not far off, and still on the mount, are the ruins of the village of Bethphage, to which place the disciples were sent for a colt on that memorable occasion when our Lord made his last visit to the guilty metropolis of Judea. The site of this place has latterly been satisfactorily traced by Dr. Olin. A few olive trees yet maintain their ground on the mount: their gnarled branches and hollow trunks prove them to be very aged. A path winds down the hill to a square space, enclosed by an ordinary stone wall, which was fixed on by early tradition as the garden of Gethsemane. "Giving myself up," says Dr. Robinson, "to the impressions of the moment, I sat down here for a time alone, beneath one of the aged trees. All was silent and solitary around: only a herd of goats were feeding not far off, and a few flocks of sheep grazing on the side of the mountain. High above towered the dead walls of the city, through which there penetrated no sound of human life. Here, or at least not far off, the Saviour endured that 'agony and bloody sweat' which was connected with the redemption of the world; and here in deep submission he prayed, 'O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me except I drink it, thy will be done.'"¹ The southern peak of Olivet is known as the Mount of Offence, because it is supposed to be the spot where the idolatrous wives of Solomon built a temple to their god, Chemosh. On a neighboring ridge is the modern village of Siloam, containing a number of Arab families, who have built their plaster huts against the side of a mountain, or have made themselves dwellings by creeping into the rocky sepulchres, where the bodies of the nobles of Judah were once placed with funeral pomp.

The "hill Gareb" (Jer. xxxi. 89) lay at the north-western corner of the ancient city. Dr. E. Henderson supposes the word to be derived from a Hebrew verb signifying "to scratch, or scrape," and that it designates the locality to which lepers were removed, as they were not allowed to remain in the city.²

Opposite Zion is the "Hill of Evil Counsel." It obtains its name from a tradition that the high priest, Caiaphas, had here a country-house, at which the Jews took counsel to destroy Jesus. On the top of the hill are the ruins of a small village.

The valleys running between the mountains are of no great breadth. On the west is the valley of Gihon, with a continuation known as the valley of Hinnom. It is a deep and narrow dell, with rocky and precipitous sides. It sweeps around Mount Zion, and descends with great rapidity into the deeper valley of Jehoshaphat. Near to the juncture of the valleys there is a spot to which Jerome assigns the place of Tophet, where the Jews practiced the horrid rites of Baal and Molech. It was probably in allusion to the fires which were here piled for the destruction of children that the later Jews applied one of the names of this valley (Gehenna) to denote the place of future punishment, or the fires of hell. Near this spot is the traditionary Aeldama, or field of blood, of the traitor Judas. It is a small plot of ground, overhung with one precipice, and looking down another into the gloomy glen below. "At the juncture of the Hinnom with the valley of Kidron, which is nearly at right angles, there is a level space of several acres, laid out in gardens, and well set with trees: this rich and beautiful spot, watered by Siloam, was called 'the King's Dale,' or Garden."³ Here Adonijah was proclaimed king. 2 Sam. xvii. 17. It is "the prettiest and most fertile place around Jerusalem."³

The rocky sides of the hills forming the valley of Jehoshaphat descend precipitously, and are adorned with many straggling olive trees. Most of these rocks are hewn into sepulchres of various forms and sizes, and with considerable care. One of them passes for the tomb of Zechariah, and a second for Jehoshaphat's; while a square detached erection is called the tomb of Absalom. No doubt they are ancient places of sepulture: they are now often the resting-places of benighted passengers, or the homes of destitute Arabs. The channel of this valley is the brook Kidron of the Scriptures. It is in the present day nothing more than the dry bed of a wintry torrent, bearing marks of being occasionally swept over by heavy volumes of water, which

¹ Henderson on Jeremiah, p. 178.

² Paxton's Letters from Palestine, p. 123.

³ Robinson's Researches, i., 490.

descend into it from the neighboring hills. After passing by Jerusalem, the brook, when flowing, finds its way into the Dead Sea. Dr. Rae Wilson saw the Kidron at a time when a regular stream of water filled the channel, occasioned by the autumnal rains. He says that, at such a season, it rushes with great impetuosity.¹

Those who desire particulars respecting Jerusalem and its suburbs will find much valuable information in the works of Olin, Robinson, Wilson, Kitto, Prime, Bartlett, Barclay, and others. They all furnish a variety of particulars which affectingly confirm the fulfilment of the Divine predictions against this highly favored, yet guilty city. It has been "given into the hands of strangers for a prey, and unto the wicked of the earth for a spoil." "All that pass by clap their hands at thee: they hiss and wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, Is this the city that men call The perfection of beauty, The joy of the whole earth?" Lam. ii. 15. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem," exclaimed the pitying Saviour, "thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate." Matt. xxiii. 37, 38. "From the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed." Lam. i. 6.

The Rev. John Hardy observes, that the prophecies concerning Judea and Jerusalem have been so exactly accomplished that they may now be read as actual history. Some of the most striking of these prophecies are to be found in Lev. xxvi.; Deut. xxix 22-24; Isa. i.; vi.; xxiv.; xxxii. 9; Jer. iv. 20, etc.; xii.; xviii.; Ezek. vii. 21; xii. 17-20; Dan. ix. 27.

No. IX.

PHYSICAL MAP OF PALESTINE,

AND THE ADJACENT COUNTRIES.

It will be seen by the accompanying map, that Palestine may be divided into four regions, distinguished by climate, vegetation, and general aspect. Three of these regions form long strips of land nearly parallel with each other and with the coast.

I. THE GREAT VALLEY AND REGION OF DEPRESSION extends from the sources of the Jordan to the Gulf of Akaba. Its general elevation is from five hundred feet above the level of the ocean to thirteen hundred feet below it. It is the hottest part of the Holy Land, the mean annual temperature being 70° to 75°. This great central basin includes the waters of Merom, the sea of Tiberias, the whole valley of the Jordan, the Dead Sea, and the Wady el Arabah. Toward this basin all the principal valleys incline, and into it the waters of the eastern slopes flow.

The Waters of Merôm, or, according to its modern name, Bahr el Hûleh, is a lake of a triangular shape, six or eight miles broad at its base, though it varies at different seasons. Its surface in many places, especially the northern part, is covered with a marsh plant, having very broad leaves. As the lake narrows toward the outlet, the plain on the west widens, forming a beautiful and very fertile champaign. On the north, its waters are skirted by a large marshy tract, densely covered with shrubs, reeds, and rushes, through which, the Arabs assert, neither man nor beast can penetrate, and which is the resort of wild fowl and other animals.¹ In consequence of the higher level of the Lake Hûleh, and the rocky and narrow character of its channel, the Jordan flows down to the Lake of Tiberias with considerable rapidity and noise. The banks are thickly overhung with groves of the plane and oleander trees.

The Lake of Tiberias, known also as the Sea of Galilee, and the Lake of Gennesaret, and Chinneroth, lies six hundred and fifty-two feet below the level of the ocean.² It is twelve miles in length, and six in breadth. Lofty irregular ridges surround it on every side, which break abruptly down to form the bed of the lake. The mountains on the east are very bold, and so continue on that side with little interruption. On the west, small and beautiful vales and charming defiles, irrigated by streams of water, separate the heights. The water is deep, clear, and pure, and abounds with excellent fish. Its flow is swift and silent. The margin presents flocks of storks, ducks, and pelicans; and occasionally vultures and eagles heavily flap their broad wings over its expanse. Dr. Clarke speaks of the uncommon grandeur of the surrounding scenery, and compares it, for picturesque beauty, with the lakes of Westmoreland and Italy. Dr. Robinson gives a less glowing description. "The lake presents, indeed," says he, "a beautiful sheet of limpid water, in a deep, depressed basin, from which the shores rise, in general, steeply and continuously all around, except where a ravine, or sometimes a deep wady, occasionally interrupts them. The hills are rounded and tame, with little of the picturesque in their form; they are decked by no shrubs nor forests; and even the verdure of the grass and herbage, which earlier in the season might give them a pleasing aspect, was already gone: they are now [in June] only naked and dreary." This sea, though generally calm, is still subject to whirlwinds and sudden gusts from the openings in the mountains, as in ancient times. Luke viii. 23, 24. The Jordan maintains its course through the middle of the lake, and may be traced by a line of smooth water through its centre.

The River Jordan is a venerated stream, identified with many of the leading events in Old Testament history, and remarkable in the New Testament as the scene of the baptism of our Lord. This chief of Syrian rivers rises under

¹ Bibliotheca Sacra, 1846.

² Lieutenant Symonds, in his Trigonometrical Survey, makes it only 328 feet; and further states, that the difference between this lake and the Dead Sea is 984 feet, giving a fall of 16·4 feet in every geographical mile.—Bibl. Sacra, 1848.

¹ Travels, i., 244.

PHYSICAL MAP OF PALESTINE AND THE ADJACENT COUNTRIES.

Constructed by Augustus Reichenow, F.R.G.S.

Section of the Line D H

3 4 Long East from Greenwich

Section of the Line A B

Section of the Line C

PHYSICAL DESCRIPTION.

- The Regions of Palestine are characteristically distinguished by differences of elevation and, consequently, by the range of climate. The physical features of the country may be divided into three main regions, namely, the highlands, the lowlands, and the coastal plain.
1. The highlands and region of Jerusalem, extending from the Jordan to the Mediterranean, with elevations from 2,000 to 5,000 feet. The climate is temperate, with a range of temperature from 40° to 80° F. The vegetation is dense, and the soil is fertile.
 2. The region of the plain adjacent to the sea, extending from the Jordan to the Mediterranean, with elevations from 100 to 1,000 feet. The climate is hot and dry, with a range of temperature from 60° to 100° F. The vegetation is sparse, and the soil is sandy.
 3. The lowlands, comprising the desert, with elevations from 100 to 1,000 feet. The climate is hot and dry, with a range of temperature from 60° to 100° F. The vegetation is sparse, and the soil is sandy.
 4. The Lebanon range, extending from the Mediterranean to the Taurus, with elevations from 10,000 to 15,000 feet. The climate is temperate, with a range of temperature from 40° to 80° F. The vegetation is dense, and the soil is fertile.
- The figures in the map and sections denote the height above sea level in English feet, those with a minus sign below the level of the sea.

RED SEA

EL ARABAH

(length)

Section of the Line C

Section of the Line A-B extending from the N. to the S. showing the range of temperature and the progress of the seasons.

PHYSICAL FEATURES OF PALESTINE
Diagram showing the within every month of the year.

N. end of L. Tiberias (Length 136 miles)
(including windings) 121 1/2 English miles
N. end of the HOLY LAND.

IX.

the lofty peaks of the Anti-Libanus, and flows in a direction almost wholly southward, flowing through the lake of Tiberias, and onward to the Dead Sea. Its present Arabic name means "the watering-place," to which the epithet "great" is sometimes prefixed. The first and most eastern source of the Jordan is named Banias; a second and principal source is about twenty miles above Cæsarea Philippi.¹ This latter streamlet flows for the first three miles through a narrow and lovely valley, and then pursues a southern course, joined by several small tributary streams, whose united waters form the Lake dred (other accounts make it one hundred and thirteen) miles in length. This officer met with twenty-seven rapids, some of them fearful and dangerous: in other parts the water dashed from side to side, as if it would break through the rocky barriers that formed its shores. Toward the end of its course, the flow of the Jordan becomes more gentle, though its meanderings continue the same. Anciently, at certain seasons, it overflowed its banks, 1 Chron. xii. 15: Jer. l. 44; and at the present day it rises in height nine to ten feet, between the months of January and March—a height sufficient to produce an extensive inundation were the channel not so deep as it is. The spaces between the outer and inner banks, on each side, which during the greater part of the year are dry, and overgrown with thickets of bushes and reeds, are the hiding-places of wild beasts, until the yearly rising of the waters compels them to fly; whence the expression, to "come up like a lion from the swelling of Jordan." Jer. xlix. 19. The common name of the great valley through which the Jordan flows is el Ghor, signifying a depressed tract or plain, usually between two mountains; and the same name continues to be applied to the valley across the whole length of the Dead Sea, and for some distance beyond. "This valley," says Dr. Richardson, "through its whole course, is bounded by a chain of mountains on each side. On the east they rise almost perpendicularly from the bed of the river; but on the west there is a fine fertile vale, averaging about half or three-quarters of a mile in breadth, between the water and the mountain. On the north of Tiberias, the hills retire in a kind of arch, forming a small triangular plain of great beauty and fertility, and well watered by a pure limpid stream: this is the ancient "land of Gennesaret," (Mark vi. 53,) and the modern el Ghuweir, or "Little Ghor."

The Dead Sea lies deep in this region of depression, being one thousand three hundred and twelve feet below the level of the Mediterranean. It is known in Scripture as the "sea of the plain," the "salt sea," and the "east sea."¹ Its collection of waters is forty miles long, and six to eight wide, except in one place, where it is contracted to only two by a broad peninsula projecting from the eastern shore. South of this point, the sea is very shallow, so that in summer, in consequence of evaporation, the body of water falls from twelve to fifteen feet to less than one; and this end of the sea at such seasons becomes an offensive marsh. The scene at all times is one of unmixed dreariness. Unstirred by the wind, the sluggish waters seem a "vast caldron of metal, fused, but motionless." "I have visited many scenes of desolation," says Mr. Hardy, "but this surpasses them all; yet this very spot, we are assured by Scripture, was once 'as the garden of the Lord.'" The shores present a sterile and forbidding aspect: in some parts the mountains appear one black el Hûleh. About ten miles farther on, the Jordan flows with some power into the Lake of Tiberias. Lieutenant Lynch, who published the first authentic account of this river, from actual survey, describes it, after leaving the lake, as pursuing a serpentine course, so that in making a distance of sixty miles in a direct line, its short and frequent windings extend to two hun-

THE COURSE OF THE JORDAN.

¹ Burckhardt says that one of the streams or springs still bears the name of Dan, or Dhan, and that the ancient name of the Banias was Jor; hence the name Jordan.

¹ Gen. xiv. 3: Deut. iii. 17: Numb. xxxiv. 3: Josh. xv 5: Ezek. xlvii. 18: Joel ii. 20.

mass of lava. Some of the stones on the shore, observes Dr. Robinson, "partially ignite in the fire, and emit a bituminous smell." Bitumen, or asphaltum, in large pieces, is found in various places, which has given to this sea its Roman name, Asphaltites. The warm fountains, the hot sulphur springs, and the appearance of every object around, testify to the volcanic character of the whole region. Masses of crystallized fossil-salt rise to fifty feet in height, and are several hundred feet in length. Lieutenant Lynch found at the western side of the lake a pillar of salt, forty-three feet high, resting on a kind of oval pedestal.¹ The waters of this sea are bitter, nauseous, and saltier than the ocean: no living thing inhabits them. Only in three instances have they been known to be navigated by man; and then one of the adventurers was found dying on the shore; and a second, immediately after his return, sunk under a fever brought on by the heat and exertion to which he was exposed. The latter explorer, Lieutenant Molyneux, experienced several storms during the two days he spent on its waters. At the end of his brief voyage "every thing in the boat was covered with a nasty slimy substance: iron was singularly corroded, and looked as if covered in patches with coal-tar; and the effects of the salt spray, by lying upon the skin, and getting into the eyes, nose, and mouth, produced constant thirst and drowsiness; and took away all appetite."¹ It has been observed that, although the Dead Sea is constantly receiving large supplies of water from the Jordan and other streams, and has no visible outlet by which they may be discharged, it yet preserves the same level. This singular fact is accounted for by the evaporation occasioned by the intense heat of the region, which occasions the mists and vapors described by early travellers as the smoke from the caldron of the sea. The appearance of the bed of these deadly waters, and of the surrounding district, bears ample evidence that the whole (or, as Dr. Robinson supposes, the southern part only) has sunk down by some extraordinary convulsion; and, at the same time, affectingly illustrates and confirms the account of the overthrow of the guilty cities of the plain. Deut. xxix. 23.

The figures denote the depth in fathoms.

Pursuing our course along the depression, we find at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea "the valley of salt," a saline morass, whose stagnant waters and impure exhalations render the whole neighborhood peculiarly unhealthy. Still farther south is a range of rugged rocks, called in Scripture Acribbim, or "scorpions." Numb. xxxiv. 4: Josh. xv. 3. Not far from thence are some chalky cliffs which divide el Ghor from el Arabah.

The Wady el Arabah extends southward nearly one hundred and five miles, and joins that branch of the Red Sea known as the Gulf of Akaba. Its western side is limited by a lofty line of cliffs, forming an abutment to the great western desert, which lies at the height of twelve to fifteen hundred feet above the bed of this valley. Its bed is a sandy desert, five or six miles in width, and its water-shed is at el Sateh, which runs obliquely across the desert valley. It is a curious fact that this immense crevasse, (as this rent in the earth's surface is geologically called,) stretching from sea to sea, "deep, dreary, and desolate," was totally unknown to modern geographers and travellers until the beginning of the nineteenth century. As the scene of some of the most remarkable incidents in the exodus of the Israelites, it claims particular attention.²

II. THE REGION OF THE PLAINS ADJACENT TO THE SHORE.—This elevation ranges from one to one thousand feet. Mean annual temperature 65° to 70°. The sea-coast, to which the name of Palestine more properly belongs, lies low, and the entrance to most of its streams and bays is choked with sand. Few good landing-places are found along the coast. Cæsarea once had a commodious harbor, but it is now barred with reefs of sand, and even small vessels are compelled to lie at anchor at the mouth of the small river Arsuf. The rest of the shore, as far as Joppa, affords no secure anchorage. The northern portion of this coast is known as the vale of Leontes, which ends at the lofty peaks of the Ras-el-Bayad. This headland is the termination of a range of hills that stretches from Safed. South of this is another mountain, el Nakura, from which point the coast becomes more level. Around the bay of Acre the hills recede, so as to form a beautiful broad plain, of a semicircular shape, and ten miles in diameter. The town of Acre, anciently Accho, stands on an angular promontory, jutting into the sea. The opposite or southern point of the bay is formed by Mount Carmel. The scenery from Beirût to Tyre is described, for the most part, as simple and uninteresting. On the one hand is the sea, and on the other a line of low hills. From Tyre to Carmel the country is more picturesque. The latter spot especially is noted as "a fruitful field," which its name signifies. From its heights various streamlets flow gently down, and evergreen meadows and vineyards adorn its sides. Numerous wild animals resort to its woodlands; and "large flocks of birds, attracted by the abundance of food, and by the waters which wind through the neighboring valleys, enliven, by their harmony of song, one of the most beautiful spots in the Holy Land." On the north of Carmel is the plain of Esdraelon, in Scripture called Megiddo and the plain of Jezreel, and which has been termed by Dr. Clarke "the battle-field of nations," from the numerous conflicts of armies which have here been witnessed from the days of Barak to those of Bonaparte. Its direction is south-easterly; and it is divided from the plain of Acre by a narrow defile, through which the Kishon makes its way. This stream is almost dry in summer, but during the rainy season it flows with great breadth and force.

¹ This pillar, or a similar one, is mentioned by Josephus and early Christian writers, and was an object of search by various travellers: the curious discovery was made by Mr. Lynch. The judgment of God overtook Lot's wife on the eastern side of the sea, while this pillar is on the western. Interesting, then, as it may be as a natural curiosity, and as an illustration of Scripture, it must not be presumed to be the identical pillar mentioned in the sacred narrative.

¹ Journal of the Royal Geographical Society, 1848.

² Coleman's Historical Geography of the Bible.

From Carmel to Joppa (Jaffa) the first part of the plain is covered with brushwood, in which there are herds of wild boars. It then becomes cultivated, and opens "on the rich pasture-land of the vale of Sharon, clothed with luxuriant verdure as far as the eye can reach. The white clover springs spontaneously, and among a variety of shrubs and flowers are a few dwarf tulips. There is nothing now bearing the appearance of what is called a rose, except the cistus roseus of Linneus, which grows abundantly. This tract of land, glorious as it is to the eye, is yet deficient of water in its central parts, and for this reason appears not to be [much] frequented even by the Arabs. The grass and flowers spring to waste their sweetness, and to fall unseen; and the storks, striding to and fro, are the only animals by which they are visited. The soil is light, and the surface elastic; and the uneven foreground swells into hills to the east, which are backed by the mountains of Samaria beyond."¹ Such is the scene early in spring, but by June the grass and the flowers are gone. Buckingham, who crossed this tract in winter, describes it as presenting an unattractive appearance. Indeed, the northern portion is at all times arid and sandy; but the farther it extends southward, it improves.

A few hills separate Sharon from the plain of Sephela—once the country of the Philistines. The soil of this district is described by Dr. Robinson as good, and yielding fair crops of grain. Shortly after the traveller has passed this plain, a perceptible struggle commences between the sand and grass. At length, all appearance of cultivation is at an end, and only drifting sands meet the eye in every direction.

III. THE TABLE-LANDS, comprising the elevated regions on both sides of the valley of the Jordan. Elevation from two thousand to three thousand feet. Mean annual temperature, 60° to 65°. Starting from the northern point of the tablelands, Mount Safed, in Galilee, first attracts the notice of the traveller. This isolated peak reaches an altitude of two thousand seven hundred and seventy feet. The ancient town that stood on it is supposed to have been the "city set on an hill," to which the Saviour drew the attention of his disciples during the delivery of the sermon on the mount. The modern city is visible from a great distance on every side except the north; while the neighboring valleys are deep, and lie much below the level of the ocean. "The declivity from the central hills of Galilee toward the great valley of the Jordan is formed by a succession of narrow plains, rising one above another from the valley of that river. Here the soil is everywhere a fine black mould, deep, free from stones, and appearing, in such a climate, capable of almost any production, were but the hand of man applied to it."² Tabor is the loftiest mountain in lower Galilee, and one of the most striking in Palestine. A path winds around the mountain, and gives a view from all its different sides, every step presenting something new and more and more beautiful. Stripped of every association, and considered merely as an elevation commanding a view of extensive valleys and mountains, it well repays the toil of ascending it.² At the north-western point from Tabor is the vale of Nazareth. It is a kind of hollow or basin, formed by enclosing hills. "It seem," says Dr. Richardson, "as if fifteen mountains met to form one enclosure for this delightful spot: they rise around it, like the edge of a shell, to guard it from intrusion. It is a rich and beautiful field in the midst of barren mountains. It abounds in fig trees, small gardens, and hedges of prickly pear, and the dense grass affords an abundant pasture."

The mountains of Samaria are chiefly of limestone, very hard, and, like all limestone strata, are filled with caverns, to which caverns reference is frequently made in Scripture. The valleys of Samaria are generally deep ravines, much narrower and steeper than those of Judea. Mount Ephraim is a tract of high land, which runs from north to south in the division of the country formerly belonging to the tribe of Ephraim. The western slope forms an almost unbroken range. Eastward it terminates by a steep descent toward the Jordan. It is a well-wooded and rather fruitful district. At the extremity of this ridge is Neby Samuel, to which the prophet Samuel convened the Israelites, and where the Philistines met with a decided overthrow. 1 Sam. vii. 2-10. On it the ancient village of Mizpeh, or "watch-tower," was situated: this Mizpeh is, however, to be distinguished from other places of the same name.

¹ Kitto's History of Palestine.

² Stephens's Incidents of Travel.

The table-lands of Judea are a continuation of those of Samaria. The most noticeable physical feature of this division of the country is the desert or wilderness of Judea, which stretches from near Jericho, on the north, to the mountains of Edom, in the south. Though called a desert, it is not to be understood that it was either uninhabited or barren, but simply that it was less fertile than other parts, and being left to its spontaneous productions, was used chiefly for pasture-land. From Jerusalem the road ascends to Bethlehem and Hebron, which is the highest point in western Palestine. The land then again descends to Eshtemoa, where it sinks into the hilly lowlands, called in Scripture "the south of Judah." Here the elevations are apparently very small, yet the plain from which they rise is itself of considerable height, and thus brings the tops of the hills to nearly fifteen hundred feet above the level of the sea.

On the "other side of the Jordan," a steep wall of rocks, averaging nearly two thousand feet in height, runs along the whole length of the country, broken only by the narrow valleys and ravines through which the streams of eastern Palestine pass down to the Jordan and its two seas. On the east of the range is a wide and undulating table-land one hundred and twenty miles in length; and near to the middle of this tract lies the elevated region called the mountains of Gilead. Here "lofty mountains give an outline of the most magnificent character; flowing beds of secondary hills soften the romantic wildness of the picture; gentle slopes, clothed with wood, give a rich variety of tints, hardly to be imitated by the pencil; deep valleys, filled with murmuring streams and verdant meadows, offer all the luxuriance of cultivation; and herds and flocks give life and animation to the scene."¹ The Scripture name of the plain south of the mountains of Gilead is Mishor, that is, "level region:" the present inhabitants have given to it the name, Belka, and to the adjoining heights Jebel el Belka. Still farther south rise the lofty Abarim mountains, or "hills of the passage," over which the Israelites passed in their march to the promised land. The neighboring districts are the Hauran, Zuleh, Ajlun, and Lejah. The substratum of the plains in this region is mostly basalt, covered with a very fruitful soil. The plain of Hauran bears fine crops of grain, but is not deep enough to sustain any trees excepting a few stunted figs. Nothing breaks the uniformity of the scene except a few black basaltic rocks, which start up here and there from the brown soil. The Lejah, a district twenty miles long and ten broad, is covered over with a vast number of black rocks, and is not suitable for cultivation, though it has good pasture-land, and in some places a grove of oaks may be seen.

The range of mountains in the south-east, anciently known as Mount Seir, now called Shera and Jebal, line the broad valley of the Arabah, and extend from the Gulf of Akaba to the Dead Sea. According to Dr. Robinson, "the structure of the chain is, at the base, low hills of limestone, or argillaceous rock; then lofty masses of porphyry, constituting the body of the mountain; above these, sandstone, broken up into irregular ridges and grotesque groups of cliffs; and again, farther back and higher than all, long, elevated ridges of limestone without precipices. East of all these stretches off indefinitely the high plateau of the great eastern desert, [which consists chiefly of fine, loose sand.] We estimated the height of the porphyry cliffs at about two thousand feet above the Arabah; the elevation of Wady Mûsa above the same is perhaps two thousand or two thousand two hundred feet; while the limestone ridges farther back probably do not fall short of three thousand feet. The whole breadth of the mountainous tract between the Arabah and the eastern desert beyond does not exceed fifteen or twenty geographical miles. The character of these mountains is quite different from those on the west of Arabah. The latter, which seemed to be not more than two-thirds as high, are wholly desert and sterile, while these on the east appear to enjoy a sufficiency of rain, and are covered with tufts of herbs and occasional trees. The wadis, too, are full of trees and shrubs and flowers, whilst the eastern and higher parts are extensively cultivated, and yield good crops. The general appearance of the soil is not unlike that around Hebron, though the face of the country is very different. It is, indeed, the region of which Isaac said to his son Esau, 'Behold, thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above.'"

IV. THE LEBANON, also the SINAITIC GROUP, which present a contrast to the deeply depressed Ghor. The elevation ranges from four thousand to ten thousand feet. Mean annual temperature probably as low as 35°. The name of Lebanon (or "whiteness") was given to the northern mountainous range in Palestine, according to some, because of its snow-capped heights; or, as others maintain, from the white limestone of which it consists. It presents great diversity of aspect, which occasioned the description of an Arabian poet: "Lebanon bears winter on its head; spring plays upon its shoulders; autumn rests on its bosom; while summer lies sleeping at its feet."

There are two principal ridges, known as Libanus and Anti-Libanus. Of the former, Mount Makmel rises to the height of nine thousand three hundred and seventy-five feet. From this point a long chain of mountains stretches toward the south, when the land again descends to the level of the sea. Below Makmel is a district of table-land about twelve miles long and four broad; and at the lower end of this tract, next the sea, Jebel Sanin rises almost perpendicularly to the height of nine thousand three hundred and fifty feet, from whence it descends by irregular gradations to the valley of the Leontes.

¹ Buckingham's Travels in Syria.

The Anti-Lebanon range runs toward the north-east, nearly parallel with Lebanon. It is now called by the inhabitants Jebel-esh-Shurky, or "the eastern mountains." Its highest peak is Jebel-esh-Sheikh, or Mount Hermon, which attains to ten thousand feet, whose summit is covered with perpetual snow. Its western declivities are completely barren, but its eastern side affords good pasturage. The mountains on this ridge, however, are generally covered with woods. Hermon is still celebrated for the heavy dews which fall on it.

Between the two Lebanons is the broad and beautiful valley of Bukaa, extending to ninety miles in length, with an average of eleven in breadth. This valley was the Cole (or Hollow) Syria of the ancients. Its water-shed, or source, near the celebrated ruins of Baalbec, rises to the height of three thousand five hundred feet above the level of the sea, and on each side of it are the springheads of two considerable rivers, the Abana and Pharpar of Scripture. The first of these, whose name signifies "the constant," and now called the Barada, rises in Anti-Lebanon: it joins the Pharpar, or "the rapid;" and at a short distance from Damascus, the united streams form the Bahr-el-Merj, or "meadow-lake." Other streams which run from these mountains are mostly lost in the sands of the desert. The remains of the far-famed forests of Lebanon lie on the western declivity of the Makmel, at a height of six thousand three hundred feet; above which is a pass more than seven thousand six hundred feet high, across which runs the road from Beirût to Damascus.

The Sinaitic group consists of an innumerable multitude of sharp rocky summits, thrown together in wild confusion, rising to different heights, leafless and barren, without the least trace of verdure to relieve the stern and awful features of the prospect. The view from one of these summits presents a perfect "sea of desolation," without a parallel on the face of the earth. The valleys between the summits sink into steep and narrow ravines, with perpendicular sides of several hundred feet in height, forming a maze of irregular defiles, which can be securely traversed only by the wild Arab, who has his habitation in the "clefts of the valleys," amidst these eternal solitudes. Toward the north this wilderness of mountains slopes down in an irregular curvilinear line, which turns outward like a crescent, and runs off, on the one hand, toward the head of the eastern gulf of the Red Sea; and on the other, north-west, to the sea itself. The extremities of the long, irregular line formed by this circular ridge are joined by a high chain of mountains, Et-Tyh, extending eastward from the Red Sea, south of Suez, in a continued chain, to the Gulf of Akaba, a distance of near one hundred and twenty miles, and enclosing in a circular segment a high sandy desert, utterly desolate and barren.

North of Et-Tyh, the whole tract of country extending to the Mediterranean, and from the Red Sea to the deep valley of the Arabah, is an immense table-land, formed into hard gravelly or rocky plateaus, lying high above the level of the adjacent waters, with a slight inclination to the north. The surface of this elevated plain is overspread with a coarse gravel, mingled with black flint-stone, interspersed occasionally with drifting sand, and only diversified with ridges and summits of barren chalk hills, and furrowed by the dry beds of winter torrents. In the time of Moses it was a great and terrible wilderness; and from time immemorial it has been a waste, howling desert, without rivers or fountains, and with but little verdure to alleviate the horrors of its desolation.¹ A few shrubs of Egyptian thorn are met with occasionally, which furnish the gum Arabic of commerce. The extreme south-eastern portion of the desert, on the route to Mecca, is called by the Arabs Roba-el-Khaly, "the empty abode," a name which well characterizes the district.

V. Some attention has been given by recent travellers to the geological and mineralogical features of Palestine and the adjoining lands. The general character of the stone which composes the great central ridges of the Syrian mountains, or which ramify from them, is that of a calcareous rock, sonorous when struck, and of a whitish or pale yellow color. It is a very hard kind of limestone, disposed in strata variously inclined, and, like all such strata, presents large voids or caverns, capable of sheltering many hundreds or thousands of men. This prevailing character of the constituent rock undergoes various modifications of texture, color, form, and intermixture, in different parts of the country.² In the extreme north of Palestine, the calcareous rock is said by Burckhardt to be of considerable hardness, and of a reddish color. The hills about Jerusalem are of a hard, light-colored limestone, which, as the traveller approaches the Dead Sea, is exchanged for white and grayish limestone of a looser texture, containing layers of a reddish micaceous stone. On the high eastern plains black basaltic rock is found in large quantities, especially about the Hauran, and also along the whole eastern border of the country. The mingled structure of the mountains of Seir, consisting of limestone, porphyry, and sandstone, has just been noticed. Dr. Olin,³ who gave much attention to the geological character of Seir and Petra, on referring to the latter place, says: "Many of the rocks are adorned with such a profusion of the most lovely and brilliant colors as, I believe, it is quite impossible to describe. Red, purple, yellow, azure, black, and white, are seen in the same mass distinctly, in successive layers, or blended so as to form every shade and hue of which they are capable—as brilliant and as soft as they ever appear in flowers, or in the plumage of birds, or in the sky when illuminated by the most glorious sunset." The primitive rocks of Sinai are granite, but more northward, toward the Akaba, cliffs of black basalt appear. The composition of the hills around the Dead Sea, according to Lynch, consists of masses of conglomerate and banks of sand, interspersed with innumerable round pieces of trap. Along the coast, particularly about Carmel, the upper part of the cliffs is principally of chalk; indeed, the chalky nature of a part of the seaboard has given the name of White Cape to Ras el Bayad, and which was, from this circumstance, called by the ancients Album Promontorium. Strata of chalk are also found along the Gulf of Akaba. Round hollow stones filled with sparry matter, known as lapides Judaici, are obtained from these chalky beds, and find a ready sale among pilgrims, who form them into amulets. In various places, petrifications, corals, and fossil shells are met with in considerable abundance. Among the natural productions are coal, saltpetre, rock-salt, sulphur, asphaltum, natron, iron, lead, and slate, which treasures only require the industry and enterprise of man to turn to a profitable account. Gold and silver, it is reported, were anciently found in small quantities. Various hot springs, from the Dead Sea northward to the Lake of Tiberias, indicate volcanic action. In the district of the latter region, especially, thermal springs abound, and were once much frequented by the Romans. The water, as it issues from the ground, is too hot to bear the hand in it: a thermometer, examined while still in the spring, stood at 144° Fahr. The taste is exceedingly salt and bitter, like hot sea-water; there is also a strong smell of sulphur, and a greenish-yellow sediment is deposited. Further evidence of the volcanic character of this region is seen in the quantities of a brittle sulphureous stone, and of lava which are found in some of the districts. In the neighborhood of Saphet, two places bear every mark of extinguished volcanoes. Palestine has also been from the earliest times exposed to earthquakes. The Scriptures abound in allusions to them; and history, down to very recent times, when more than five thousand persons were destroyed at Saphet alone, bears repeated testimony to the devastation they have occasioned.

¹ Coleman's Historical Geography of the Bible. Stanley's Sinai and Palestine.

² Kitto's Physical Geography of the Holy Land.

³ Travels, vol. ii.

Attention is invited to the climatological diagram on the accompanying map, which presents at one view the progress of the seasons, the general bearings of the wind, the prevailing weather, and the range of temperature throughout the year.

As in the present map, and indeed in most modern ones, as well as in books of eastern travel, some Arabic words are unavoidably introduced, the following explanations may be useful:

AIN, a fountain.
BAR, a gate.
BAHR, a lake or sea.
BERT, place, house.
BIR, a well.
EL, the.
JEBEL, a range of mountains.
JESIREH, an island.
KASR, a castle.
KEFR, a village.

KHAN, an inn.
MERJ, a meadow.
NAHR, a river.
NEBY, a prophet.
TEHAMA, lowlands.
TEL, a hill.
TOR, a mountain.
SAHEL, a field, or plain.
WADY, a rain brook, or the valley in which it flows.

Nos. X. and XI.

THE TABERNACLE,

ITS ALTARS, UTENSILS, AND PRIESTS

DURING the nomadic state of the children of Israel, a movable and portable tabernacle, or tent, for the purposes of Divine worship, best suited their unsettled condition. The "Tabernacle of the congregation," or, as it has been called, the Ante-Sinaitic Tabernacle, was the first erection of the kind, and was placed by Moses "afar off from the camp." Exod. xxxiii. 7. This was, probably, only a large tent, where Moses transacted public business. The next was the Sinaitic, constructed, under the Divine direction, by Bezaleel and Aholiab, and was set up in the desert, on the first day of the month in the second year after leaving Egypt. To this succeeded the third, or Davidic Tabernacle, erected by David on Mount Moriah, for the reception of the ark. 2 Sam. vi. 12. For four hundred years after the conquest of Canaan the Israelitish sanctuary was a tent, when it was superseded by the magnificent structure of Solomon's Temple. The present description will refer to the second of these Tabernacles, the Sinaitic.

The Tabernacle erected in the Arabian Desert, as the visible dwelling-place of the Most High, was not formed after the device or arrangement of man, but was unfolded in its entire plan by God himself. Minute and careful directions were given to Moses at Mount Sinai as to the form and size of the building, the materials to be employed, and the sacred utensils that were to belong to it. A solemn injunction was given: "According to all that I show thee, after the pattern of the Tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it." Exod. xxv. 9-40. The necessary supplies of materials and money were liberally provided by the offerings of the people. It is computed that the value of the metals alone would amount to more than £240,000 [say $1,200,000] of our money. The valuables given to the Israelites on their leaving the land of Egypt, and the spoils taken when their enemies were drowned at the Red Sea, probably supplied a large portion of these offerings.

1. The Court of the Tabernacle.—The outer enclosure was the court of the Tabernacle, about one hundred and fifty feet long, and seventy-five broad, forming an oblong square. It was surrounded on all sides with fine twined linen curtains, probably a kind of network, through which persons on the outside might see the interior. This network was suspended from silver rods, which extended from one column to another. The columns were sixty in number, made of shittim wood, a kind of acacia, or, as some think, of cedar, and covered with brass. The entrance to the court was in the centre of the east end, formed by a rich curtain, wrought in needle-work, with blue, purple, and scarlet, and which could be drawn up when so required.

2. The Tabernacle.—The Tabernacle, pro-

SUPPOSED
FORM AND ARRANGEMENT
OF
THE TABERNACLE, CAMP, &c.,

PRIEST

HIGH PRIEST

LEVITE

TABLE OF SHOWBREAD

ALTAR

GOLDEN CANDLES

ALTAR OF BURNT OFFERING

LAVER

Scale of Feet, 21 Inches being taken as equal to 1 Cubit

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 feet

perly so called, was placed about the middle of the western side of the above court. It was of an oblong-square figure, fifty feet in length by eighteen in breadth. The two sides and the west end were constructed of planks of shittim wood. Twenty planks were on the north side, the same number on the south, and six on the west, an additional board being added to each western corner. This framework was covered with plates of gold, and each plank was furnished at the bottom with two tenons, which were received into mortices or large sockets of solid silver; and to give the whole greater security and firmness, they were fastened to bars by rings or staples of gold, which served as the ribs of the fabric, binding the whole together. The eastern end was left for the entrance, and was closed by a curtain of worked linen, or tapestry, hanging from silver rods. The roofing to this framework consisted of four coverings. The first was in ten pieces, made of fine twined linen, into which the figures of cherubim were worked with blue, purple, and scarlet colors. The different parts of this first covering were joined together by loops of blue and hooks of gold: it hung about two feet from the ground. The second covering was somewhat larger, and consisted of eleven pieces, made of very fine goats' hair: provision was likewise made for uniting these pieces, by loops and clasps of brass, into one large curtain. The third covering was of rams' skins, dyed red; and the fourth of what is called in the English translation badgers' skins, though it is uncertain what animal is meant. As this last was designed to resist inclement weather, some have supposed it was made of the skins of dolphins and porpoises, procured from the Red Sea.

The Tabernacle was divided into two unequal parts: the first occupied about two-thirds of the length, or nearly thirty-five feet. This was the "Holy Place," or "the first Tabernacle." Heb. ix. 2. The inner apartment was half this size, and was called the "Most Holy Place," the "Holiest of all," and "the Holy of Holies." The separation was made by a curtain, called "the veil," and sometimes "the second veil," the one hanging over the entrance forming the first. Heb. ix. 3. Into the inner chamber the high-priest alone was allowed to enter, and that but once in the course of the year, on the great day of atonement.

3. The Brazen Altar.—About the middle of the outer court was the altar of burnt-offerings, or the brazen altar. Its frame was square, nearly five feet and a half in height, and nine feet in length and breadth. The sides were made of shittim wood, covered with brass. The fire was kindled upon a grate of brass; though some conjecture that this grate was only a frame on which a layer of earth was placed, and that the sacrifices were burned upon this earthy surface. Exod. xx. 24. The use of the earth may have been to preserve the wood-work from the destructive effects of the fire. The four corners of the altar projected upward, so as to resemble horns, and were regarded as peculiarly sacred. Exod. xxvii. 2: Ps. cxviii.

27. To these the victims were bound; and criminals, as in the cases of Joab and Adonijah, caught hold of them: on solemn occasions the officiating priest sprinkled the blood of the victim on these horns. Lev. iv. 25, 30. On the south side was a sloping ascent to the altar, made of heaped-up earth. The fire used upon the altar was regarded as sacred, having first descended thereon from heaven, Lev. ix. 24: it was kept continually burning, and never allowed to go out. Lev. vi. 13. The rabbis state that it was kept alive by miracle during the wanderings, and even though covered up in cloths and skins when on the march: it is more probable that the grate containing the fire was taken from the altar, and carried by itself. There were various articles for the use of the altar, as pots or urns to take away the ashes, shovels, basins, flesh-hooks, and firepans, all of which were made of brass. Exod. xxxviii. 1-7.

4. The Brazen Laver.—Midway between the altar and the Tabernacle was placed the laver, filled with water for the ablutions of the priests previous to their entrance on the ritual services. It was a circular vessel, made of the brass which formed the mirrors of the Israelitish women. Exod. xxxviii. 8. Mirrors of highly polished metal were in common use among the ancients. The laver rested on an ornamented foot or pedestal. Its dimensions are uncertain, though it probably was much smaller than is commonly represented. Fresh water was placed in it every morning.

5. The Candlestick.—The Tabernacle was without windows: its light was obtained from a large lamp-holder, made of pure gold, the main stem or shaft of which was, according to the Jewish writers, five feet high. Its weight was a talent, or one hundred and twenty-five pounds; although, as Josephus asserts, it was hollow within, and must therefore have been of considerable size. It had six branches parallel with each other: at the end of each branch, and at the top of the main stem, was a lamp. The stem and each branch were ornamented with a bowl, knop, and flowers of lilies. All the seven lights were kept burning in the night; but, it is said, only three were used in the day-time. The lamps were supplied with the purest olive oil, procured, not by the common method of pressure, but by bruising or beating the olives, while yet somewhat green, in a mortar. Connected with this lamp-stand were tongs and snuff-dishes: the former were probably in the form of scissors, to clip off the snuff, and remove it into the dish.

6. The Table of Showbread.—On the north side of the Holy Place was the table of showbread, as the candlestick was over against it on the south. It was a table of shittim wood, about three feet and a half in length, twenty inches broad, and about thirty inches in height, covered with plates of gold, and ornamented with a border of wrought gold. The frame of the table had a cornice or border round about it, about four inches in width, called its crown; and a similar border was underneath the top. There were also gold rings fastened to the legs, for the insertion of the staves to carry it. Twelve loaves of unleavened bread were continually on this table, each containing about ten pints of flour. They were placed in two piles, (or as some say, in rows,) and on the top of each pile was a small quantity of frankincense and salt. These loaves were changed every week, when the frankincense was burned as an oblation. The name given to them in the original means "bread of the face," because it was placed before the presence of Jehovah. Wine was also placed upon this table in small bowls, or cups, called vials, which was weekly "poured out before the Lord."

7. The Altar of Incense.—A small altar for incense was placed near the veil which divided the Tabernacle. It was made of shittim wood, twenty-one inches in length, the same in breadth, and three feet and a half in height. It was ornamented and plated with gold, and hence was called the golden altar, to distinguish it from the brazen altar in the outer court. It had an ornamental border of gold, and four small horns at the corners, which it has been supposed were symbolical of sovereignty, strength, and glory. There were at the sides rings for the staves by which it was carried. While the incense was burning on this altar, night and morning, it was customary for the worshippers who were standing without to offer their prayers in silence. The priest was strictly enjoined not to offer "strange incense," that is, any other than the sacred composition, upon the golden altar.

8. The Ark of the Covenant.—At the western end of the Holy of Holies was a chest, called the Ark of the Covenant. It was constructed of shittim wood, and covered within and without with the purest gold, with an ornamental rim or border on the top. Its breadth was rather more than thirty inches, the same in depth, and three feet and a half in length. On each side were two gold rings for the gold-covered staves by which it was removed, and which were not withdrawn from their places. They were drawn out so far as to touch the veil which separated the apartments. The lid of the ark was of purest gold: above it were two figures of cherubim, made of solid gold, so placed that their faces turned toward each other, and were inclined toward the ark. Between these cherubim rested the Shechinah, or the manifestation of the presence of God: its appearance was that of a luminous cloud. There, the Lord said to Moses, "I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy-seat, from between the two cherubim which are upon the ark of the testimony." The primary idea of the Hebrew word Shechinah is that of a "sacred dwelling." There was nothing in the ark but the two tables of stone, called "the testimony," on which the ten commandments were graven. 1 Kings viii. 9. In front of the ark stood a vase of gold, which contained a pot of manna, and the rod of Aaron which budded. By its side was a coffer, containing a copy of the law. Or, the manna and the rod may have been in the ark when placed by Moses in the Tabernacle; as the apostle Paul states that the golden pot and the rod were in the inside of the ark itself, with the tables of the covenant. Either we may understand him to mean simply that these articles belonged to it, and were placed securely by its side; or else, that they really were placed within the ark at first, but afterwards displaced during the confusion which prevailed in the time of the judges. When the camp was removed, the ark was covered with much reverence with a purple pall, and borne by the priests in the midst of the marching host.

9. Mode of Encampment.—During the wanderings of the Israelites the Tabernacle was erected in the midst of the camp. Immediately around its court were pitched the tents of the priests and Levites; the priests having their place to the east before the entrance, the family of Gershon to the west, that of Kohath to the south, and that of Merari to the north. Outside of these, at some distance, the other tribes encamped in four great divisions, each consisting of three tribes. Each of these divisions had its separate standard, and principal tribe, by whose name it was distinguished. Thus, on the east was the camp of Judah, including the tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun: on the south side, the camp of Reuben, including the tribes of Reuben, Simeon, and Gad: on the west, the camp of Ephraim, including the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin: on the north, the camp of Dan, including the tribes of Dan, Asher, and Naphtali. When the signal was given to march, the Tabernacle was taken down, and all its parts committed to the care of the Levites, to be carried to the next place of encampment. The priests, Aaron and his family, covered all the articles before the Levites were allowed to come into the Tabernacle to prepare for the removal. Each of the three families of the Levites had its particular charge in this service assigned to it by the Lord. The care of the most holy things, the sacred furniture of the Tabernacle, and its court, were intrusted to the sons of Kohath, and they were required to carry the whole upon their shoulders. For convenient carriage, the ark, the table, and both the altars were furnished with rings, through which staves or poles, prepared for the purpose, were made to pass, by means of which they might be lifted and borne. In marching, the camp of Judah moved forward first; then followed the camp of Reuben; next came the Levites, with the several parts of the Tabernacle; immediately after them the camp of Ephraim set forward; the camp of Dan brought up the rear. Num. ii.; iii. 17–39; iv. 1–33.

When the Israelites entered the land of Canaan the Tabernacle was set up at Gilgal, where they first encamped. It remained there about seven years, and then was removed to Shiloh, a more central situation, a few miles north of Jerusalem. Here other tents and buildings were placed around it, for the residences of the priests and the reception of various articles connected with the services. It remained at Shiloh till after the death of Eli, considerably more than three hundred years. In the days of Saul, the Tabernacle was fixed at Nob, and from thence was removed to Gibeon. At the commencement of Solomon's reign, it was found still at Gibeon: we have no account of it after the Temple was built.

PLAN OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE with the two Inner Courts.

PLAN OF HEROD'S TEMPLE

The ark abode in its place in the Tabernacle until it was presumptuously carried into the field of battle, and was taken captive by the Philistines, but who were compelled to return it after a short time. 1 Sam. iv. It appears not to have been restored to its place when sent back by the heathen: it abode for seventy years at Kirjath-jearim, until shortly after the settlement of David on the throne, when it was carried up to Jerusalem and lodged in a tent prepared for it; and from thence was duly conveyed, with the other holy utensils, and placed in the magnificent Temple erected by Solomon.

GARMENTS OF THE PRIESTS.—The engravings on No. 11 furnish what may be regarded as approximate representations of the priestly vestments. An account of the holy garments of the HIGH-PRIEST, which God directed to be made for his use, is found in Exod. xxviii. These were, in addition to those worn by other priests: 1. The coat, or robe of the ephod, made of blue wool: it was of the form of a long shirt, without sleeves, but with openings for the arms and the neck, richly embroidered. It reached down to the knees; and upon the hem of its lower part were seventy-two golden bells, with representations of pomegranates, in needle-work, between them. 2. The ephod consisted of two parts, one of which hung over the back, reaching to the heels, and the other over the breast, extending only to a little lower than the waist, and was secured by a girdle or sash under the arms. It was of fine twisted linen, wrought in gold and purple. On each shoulder it was secured by an onyx stone set in gold, which acted as a clasp, and on each of which was graven the names of six of the tribes of Israel. 3. The breastplate of judgment was a square piece of cloth, measuring only a span each way, or eleven inches square, composed of the same highly ornamented material as the ephod. On it were four rows of precious stones, each row having three stones, on every one of which was engraved the name of one of the twelve tribes. It is to be observed that these names were engraved on the hardest stones known to exist, and which shows that the art of gem-engraving must have been well understood in that early age. In this breastplate were the Urim and Thummim, though what these were it is impossible now to determine. The words mean "light" and "perfection," or, according to the Septuagint, "revelation" and "truth." This breastplate was fastened to the front part of the ephod; and thus the names of the children of Israel were carried by the high-priest upon his heart and upon his shoulders for a memorial before the Lord whenever he went into the holy place. 4. The mitre, turban, or covering of the head, was formed of fine linen, and finished with peculiar elegance and taste, on the front of which was a small plate of pure gold, with the expressive inscription, "Holiness to the Lord." Garments exactly like those of the high-priest, in materials, form, and color, were not allowed to be worn by any other person; nor was the high-priest himself permitted to wear them as an ordinary dress, but only when engaged in the solemn services connected with his office. On the great day of atonement, however, he put off this splendid official dress, and clothed himself in plain and simple linen apparel. Lev. xvi. 4, 28.

The costume of an ORDINARY PRIEST was linen drawers, tunics, or long garments with sleeves, a girdle of embroidered cloth, encircling the body, twice crossed over the breast, and hanging down in front, and a mitre. Reverence, it was considered, did not allow the use of sandals or shoes in the performance of the holy ministry: accordingly all the priests and Levites served with naked feet at all times.

The LEVITES were a subordinate class of ministers in the service of the sanctuary. Their dress was of a very simple kind, and similar to the common priests. They were divided by David into four principal classes. The first class, consisting of twenty-four thousand, were appointed to "set forward the work of the house of the Lord," and were subdivided into courses or classes of one thousand each, who attended in the sanctuary in succession, each for a week. 1 Chron. xxiv. 1-19. The various services were distributed by lot. Thus it fell to one to burn incense, to another to kill the sacrifice, and to another to sprinkle the blood. The second course, consisting of six thousand, were officers and magistrates, sent throughout the land. The third, of four thousand, were porters, or guards; and the fourth, of the same number, were musicians and singers. The more servile work of the Tabernacle and Temple, such as carrying water and hewing wood, was done by Nethinim, that is, "given" or "devoted ones." Some of these were descendants of the Gibeonites, and others were Canaanites.

No. XII.

PLAN OF THE TEMPLE.

SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.

THE unsettled state of the Israelites during the time of the judges, and the frequent wars of their first two kings, prevented the erection of a more substantial sanctuary than the Tabernacle. But no sooner had David firmly established his government than he arranged for an orderly attendance on the services of religion at Gibeon. A few years subsequently, he remembered that the ark of God still remained within the curtains of a movable tent, while he was magnificently accommodated in a palace of cedar. The idea of erecting a stone-built temple was now first awakened in his mind; but Nathan, the prophet, was directed to inform him that, though his pious intentions were approved of by God, this honor was reserved for his son, in whose days the kingdom should enjoy uninterrupted peace. He was, however, allowed to bear a part in the great work, by making vast preparations for it, and in collecting a large store of gold, silver, and costly materials. The hill was also made known to him on which the building should be erected. Before his death, the aged monarch carefully delivered the materials and the plan to his son, and exhorted the princes of Israel to aid the youthful king in this pious design 1 Chron. xxviii. 1-19.

In pursuance of this object, "Solomon began to build the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, in Mount Moriah, where the Lord appeared unto David, his father, in the place that David had prepared in the threshing-floor of Ornan, (Araunah,) the Jebusite." 2 Chron. iii. 1. He largely added to the materials prepared by his father, and entered into treaty with Hiram, king of Tyre, for the service of Phœnician artists and workmen. "In the fourth year (of Solomon's reign) was the foundation of the house of the Lord laid, in the month Zif; and in the eleventh year, in the month Bul, which is the eighth month, was the house finished throughout all the parts thereof, and according to all the fashion of it. So was he seven years in building it." 1 Kings vi. 37, 38.

Josephus says¹ that the foundations of the Temple were laid on a steep eminence, the natural summit of which did not offer a sufficient level space. As it was surrounded by precipices, it became necessary to build strong walls and buttresses from the valley, to gain an enlarged extent of surface, the intervening space being filled with earth. The hill was also fortified by a triple wall, the lowest tier of which was in some places more than three hundred cubits high;² and the depth of the foundation was not visible, because it had been necessary in some parts to dig deep into the ground, in order to obtain sufficient support.

The dimensions of the stones of which the foundations and wall were composed were enormous. Josephus states that the builders were directed to search for the largest blocks that could be found, some of which were forty cubits in length, and which were cut into shape on the mountains where they were found, and then conveyed to Jerusalem.³ It is evident there must have been some knowledge of the laws of mechanics for the transit of these ponderous blocks from their distant quarries, over the rugged mountains, and the raising of them to the lofty heights appropriated to them in the building. The Jewish historian further states, that the stones composing the outer walls were entirely white, and were put together with so much skill, that the interstices were not perceptible.

The dimensions of the Temple were not so extensive and imposing as is commonly supposed. It was constructed, not with a view to the accommodation of the people generally, like Christian places of worship, as they were not permitted to enter into the interior, but offered their prayers and sacrifices in the front of the building, or in its outer quadrangle. The body of the building, or "the Holy Place," admitted only the officiating priests. A porch extended along the whole eastern front of the house, which rose to the height of two hundred and ten feet. At its entrance were two great pillars of brass, (in that age a most costly metal,) sixty feet high, including the capital and base, distinguished by the names of Jachin and Boaz, ("durability" and "strength.") Whether these were detached obelisks, like those found before some ancient Egyptian temples, or whether they supported the entablature of the porch, is a disputed point. The height of the Temple itself, according to Josephus, was sixty cubits, or one hundred and five feet; but in 1 Kings vi. 2, it is given at only thirty cubits. The latter was, probably, the height of the external walls, the former of the raised parts of the interior. The length of the building was sixty cubits, and its width twenty. The dimensions of the sanctuary, or "Holy Place," were forty cubits long, twenty wide, and thirty high. The "Holy of Holies" formed a square of twenty cubits. Into the latter chamber none but the high-priest were permitted to enter, and he only once in a year, on the great day of atonement. Heb. ix. 2-7. Here was the cloud manifesting the Shechinah, or Divine presence, which was, as Dr. Hales observes, "at the west end of the sanctuary, pointing, as it were, toward Calvary, the true place of atonement for the sins of mankind; and also to distinguish it from the heathen temples, whose adyta, or oracles, usually fronted the east, or rising sun, the grand object of heathen idolatry."

The "Holy of Holies" was separated from the outer apartment by a partition of cedar and folding-doors of olive wood, carved with cherubim, palm trees, and flowers, overlaid with gold. A similar pair of doors, of larger dimensions, hung on massive golden hinges, or pins, formed the outer entrance. These doors were left open, and the space covered with a superb veil of blue, purple, scarlet, and white twined linen yarn. The court of the priests was separated from the court of the congregation by a low stone balustrade of one cubit in height; so that all the ritual service performed at the altar was open to the view of those who stood in the extended space without. The different courts were placed, as it were, in terraces, each inner court being higher than the next outward one: thus the centre of the Temple, from its elevated position, was clearly seen from every part of the city.

The inner sides of the walls were narrowed, or made thinner, as they ascended, by shelvings of about eleven inches in width, on which the beams of the several parts rested, without the necessity of inserting the ends into the substance of the wall: "so that there was neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was in building." 1 Kings vi. 7. The "narrow lights," or windows, 1 Kings vi. 4, in the uppermost stories of the side chambers, were probably of curious lattice-work, and chiefly designed for ventilation. The "Holy Place" was lighted by the lamps of the ten golden candlesticks; and it is generally understood that the Holy of Holies was strictly an adytum, having no windows; and that to this circumstance Solomon alludes, "The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness." 1 Kings viii. 12. The wainscot of the walls and the ceiling was ornamented with cedar, beautifully carved, representing cherubim, clusters of foliage, and fruit, over which was a thick coating of pure gold. Some of these latter ornaments were combinations of the most "precious stones," 2 Chron. iii. 6, which, contrasting with the gold, produced a most brilliant effect. Planks of cedar, veneered with fir, and covered with gold, formed the floor: the doors were chiefly of olive wood.

¹ De Bell. Jud., v., 5.

² A cubit was equal to one foot nine inches.

³ "In the sub-basement of the great temple at Baalbek there is one stone sixty-six feet in length by twelve in breadth and thickness, with others of not greatly inferior size; while in a neighboring quarry, which tradition declares to be that from which Solomon obtained his 'great stones,' are stones of equal and greater dimensions, cut and ready for use, one of them being no less than seventy feet in length by fourteen feet five inches in thickness."—Kitto's Bible Illustrations, vol. iv., p. 47.

Though the Temple, strictly considered, was limited in its dimensions, the whole site, embracing the surrounding courts, store-chambers, and residences of the officiating priests, covered a large extent of ground, and was "like a costly gem in a broad setting of gold." In our plan of Solomon's Temple, the outer court is omitted, in order to preserve the scale from being too much limited: it was, however, similar in arrangement to the plan of Herod's Temple, engraved on the same plate.

On the completion of the Temple, it was dedicated by Solomon with great solemnity. The ark was brought from its tented enclosure, and placed in the "Holy of Holies," with sounds of thanksgiving and joy. Numerous sacrificial offerings were made, the "glory of the Lord filled the place," and fire descended from heaven and consumed the sacrifices on the altar. At these manifestations of the Divine presence and approval, all the people "bowed themselves with their faces to the ground, and praised the Lord, saying, For he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever." 2 Chron. vii. 1-3.

This superb Temple retained its pristine splendor only thirty-three years, when it was plundered by Shishak, king of Egypt, (the celebrated Sesostris of the Greek historian.) 1 Kings xiv. 25, 26: 2 Chron. xii. 9. Under the Hebrew kings, Jehoram and Ahaziah, it fell into great decay, but was repaired about the year B.C. 889. After this it underwent several profanations and pillages, until, at length, it was utterly destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. When the Jews returned from their captivity, it was rebuilt by Zerubbabel, whom Cyrus appointed governor of Judea. The dimensions of this Temple in breadth and length were double those of Solomon's. It wanted, however, five things which constituted the principal glory of the first Temple; namely, the ark and mercy-seat; the visible glory of the Shechinah; the holy fire on the altar; the Urim and Thummim; and the spirit of prophecy. This Temple was plundered and profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes, who ordered the discontinuance of the daily sacrifice, and erected his idol, Jupiter Olympus, on the altar of burnt-offering. About three years after this desecration it was repaired and beautified by Judas Maccabeus, who restored Divine worship. This second Temple stood for about five hundred years, when, being much decayed by the lapse of time, it was repaired, or rather gradually reconstructed, by Herod the Great, as an act of policy, with a view to ingratiate himself in the favor of his Hebrew subjects, who, notwithstanding they denied the power, were much attached to the forms of religion. But though rebuilt, it was still called by the Jewish writers the second Temple.

HEROD'S TEMPLE.

This superb building employed eighteen thousand men for more than nine years in its erection; but additional courts were added from time to time, so that in the days of our Lord the Jews could correctly say that forty-six years were occupied in its construction. John ii. 20. The Temple was not at once taken down with a view to its reërection; the Jews feared that the king, if he pulled down the entire building, would be unable or unwilling to accomplish its restoration. Herod, to convince them of his sincerity, got ready a thousand wagons, chose out ten thousand skilful workmen, and had some of the priests taught in the arts necessary to his purpose. Josephus says, that with respect to magnitude, building, and the splendor of its ornaments, utensils, and furniture, it was the most magnificent structure he had ever seen. "It was built," says he, "on a hard rock, in which the foundations were laid at an incredible expense. The Temple itself was sixty cubits high, and as many broad; but in the front Herod added two wings or shoulders, each of which, projecting twenty cubits, made the whole length of the front one hundred cubits, by as many in breadth. The gate was seventy cubits high and twenty broad; but it was without doors. The stones were white marble, twenty-five cubits in length, twelve in height, and nine in breadth, all polished and unspeakably beautiful. Instead of doors, the gate was closed with vails, flowered with gold, silver, purple, and every thing rich and curious. At each side of the gate were two pillars, from whence hung golden festoons, and vines with leaves and clusters of grapes curiously wrought."

Court of the Gentiles.—The principal entrance on the east, which led into the court of the Gentiles, was called the gate Shushan, derived from a representation of the Persian city of Shushan portrayed upon it, to remind the Jews of their captivity, and that they might not again fall into idolatry; or, as others suppose, to commemorate the wonderful deliverance of the Jewish nation from the malice of Haman, when they were in subjection to the Persians. At this gate the half-shekel tribute (Exod. xxx. 13) was collected during three weeks before the passover; and here sat the money-changers, ready to supply Jewish coins for the Temple dues in exchange for foreign money. There were other gates, all of which had towers over them. This outer court being assigned to the Gentile converts, the Jews, who in later times did not worship in it themselves, conceived that they might appropriate it to secular uses, such as a market for the sale of sacrificial animals, incense, and oil—a practice which received a severe rebuke from our Lord. The court of the Gentiles was often called "the mountain of the house," because in it assembled proselytes from all nations to worship. Farther than this place no one who was not a strict Hebrew was allowed to approach. Its flooring consisted of pieces of marble stones, of various colors, tastefully and smoothly arranged. The wall and roof of the Temple generally were covered with polished gold externally, which had a most gorgeous appearance when the sun shone upon them.

Around the court was a piazza, or covered walk, supported by massive pillars of white marble, and crowned with a ceiling of the finest cedar. Along this covered walk were convenient seats; and the place furnished a pleasant retreat for the people in sultry or rainy weather. That portion of the piazza lying on the east was known as "Solomon's porch," which was the scene of our Lord's instructions, and the miraculous power of his apostles. Above this were galleries or apartments. This portico is represented by Josephus as the noblest work under the sun. From the roof of this piazza, the view down into the depths of the valley below was very impressive, being, it is said, no less than seven hundred and fifty feet. The extreme angle or pinnacle of this part of the building is supposed to have been the spot whence Satan tempted our Saviour to precipitate himself.

Court of the Women.—Standing in this outer court, the spectator beheld the house of the Temple, rising with lofty magnificence, and enclosed in a second wall. Immediately before him was a flight of steps which led into the Court of the Women. It was so called, not because it was occupied exclusively by women, but because they were not allowed to go farther into the interior. The court itself was a level space, ten cubits broad, paved with marble. On the sides of the gates were tablets, inscribed in Greek and Latin, prohibiting an entrance to all Gentiles and every ceremonially polluted person. Directly opposite the gate Shushan, of the outer court, was the eastern gate, richly overlaid with Corinthian brass, which is thought to have been the gate called "Beautiful," at which the lame man lay to ask alms of those who were going into the Temple. Acts iii. 2-11. This court was the place where men, as well as women, ordinarily performed their worship, when they appeared at the Temple without bringing their sacrifices with them. Here Peter and John used to go up with others, to pray toward the Temple of the Most High. Acts iii. 1. Here it was that the self-righteous Pharisee and broken-hearted publican appeared at the same time; the one boldly presenting himself close up to the gate that led forward to the interior, and pleading his own worthiness before a holy God; the other standing afar off, near the outer door, not daring to lift his head toward the dwelling-place of the Lord, but smiting upon his breast and crying, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." Luke xviii. 9-14. Paul was in the same court when he was violently seized by his countrymen, and charged, among other things, with having brought Gentiles into that holy place. Acts. xxi. 26-30. This court was the place of the "treasury," where the people presented their offerings of money for the service of the Temple. Several chests or vessels, called "trumpets," because they were wide at the bottom and small at the top, were placed in some part of it, to receive the gifts: each vessel was appointed to receive some one particular class of offerings; one, for instance, was for money contributed to buy wood for the altar; another, for money to buy frankincense; and so the rest for different uses. Here our Saviour beheld the people casting in their offerings, when the poor widow came forward with her two mites, and cast in all that she had. Mark xii. 41-44. In this part of the temple it was, too, that he delivered some of his solemn and impressive discourses, teaching the people, and reproving their unbelief. John viii. 20.

The Court of Israel.—Another flight of steps conducted into the Court of Israel. Beside the gate leading from the Court of the Women, there were three other gates on the north and three on the south, by which the Court of Israel might be entered. Around this enclosure were various chambers, in which the Levites deposited their musical instruments, and which also were used for other purposes connected with the service of Divine worship. An elegant railing divided this court from that of the priests, so that the Israelites who there came to attend the offering of sacrifices could, without difficulty, witness the ceremony in the inner part of the Temple.

The Court of the Priests.—In this division was the beautiful building of the Sanctuary, with the altar of burnt-offering, and the laver standing in front of it. Here the priests performed their daily service. Beside these, no other Israelite might pass the railing just noticed, except when he came forward solemnly to lay his hands upon the head of a victim that he presented for sacrifice, or to wave part of his offering before the Lord. Along the eastern end of this court, facing the front of the sanctuary, was another covered porch. Here the Levites stood in a row, at appointed times, "with their various instruments in their hands, playing and singing with a loud voice to the praise of the most high God. The rest of this covered space, before the narrow range set apart for the use just mentioned, was for the accommodation of the priests when any of them were not called to be employed in service elsewhere in the court. There were no seats, however, provided for them to sit upon and rest themselves. It was not considered lawful for persons to sit at all, either in the Court of the Priests or in the Court of Israel around it; reverence toward God and regard for the holiness of these places were required to be continually manifested by standing on the feet."¹

The Sanctuary, or the Temple proper, as it stood in the days of our Lord, was larger in its dimensions than that of the building erected by Solomon, though constructed after the same general plan. The walls of this part were built of large blocks of beautiful white marble. They rose to the height of three stories, and included various chambers. The Holy of Holies stood in its midst, but was entirely empty, excepting a stone, which marked the place once occupied by the ark of the covenant. This stone was sprinkled by the high-priest with the blood of the sacrifice on the great day of atonement, and thereon he placed the censer of incense. Before the entrance were two curtains, or vails, which are spoken of in Scripture and by Josephus as one, as they formed one partition. This vail was rent asunder from the top to the bottom at the moment our Lord gave up the ghost on the cross, which signified that the mysteries of the Jewish dispensation were at an end, to make way for the clearer revelation of the gospel; and especially that the way of access to God was now opened, Christ having entered for us with his own blood into "the holy place" not made with hands, and secured for all believers holy liberty and confidence at the mercy-seat. Heb. ix. 7, 12.

¹ Nevins' Biblical Antiquities.

"He that never saw Jerusalem in her glory," say the Jewish rabbis, "never saw a lovely city; and he that never saw the Temple never saw the most noble fabric under the sun." While we make some allowance for the exaggerated mode of expression of these ancient doctors, it must be admitted that the latter building was of extraordinary magnificence, and might well challenge the admiration of the simple-minded fishermen of Galilee, who exclaimed, "Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here!" But He who saw the overwhelming judgments that were at hand replied, "Seest thou these great buildings? there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." And so it came to pass in less than forty years. The Jews, besieged by the Romans, made a fortress of it; and though every effort was made by Titus, the Roman general, to save it from the general destruction, wild and terrific flames wrapped the glory of Moriah in utter ruin. The remains of the walls were afterward demolished to the foundation, and the whole ground on which the Temple stood was, according to the Romish custom, ploughed up, thus fulfilling the Divine prediction. Micah iii. 12. Its site is now occupied by a Mohammedan mosque.

The daily services of the Temple were, in the main, the same as in the Tabernacle in the days of Aaron, though a variety of formal and trivial observances had been associated with them in the course of ages. There were still the morning and evening sacrifice of the lamb, and the impressive ceremonials of the great day of atonement, by which were preserved a perpetual remembrance of the awful guilt and demerit of sin, and of the infinite purity and justice of God. At the same time there was prefigured the "one offering" of Christ, as "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." In the oblation of incense on the golden altar was typified in a lively manner his mediation who has entered into heaven itself, where, as the High-Priest of his Church, he ever lives to plead the virtue of his sacrificial death. And in the washings and purifications of the brazen laver were set forth the need of universal cleansing by the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit. Thus, while on the altar the eye of faith beheld as it were this inscription, "Without shedding of blood is no remission," so on the laver it might discern the correlative truth, "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." That, however, which was presented to the ancient Israelites under types and ceremonies is now clearly made known in the gospel, and the "fountain opened for sin and uncleanness" is free, not to the Jew alone, but to the people of every nation under heaven. But with this clearer light and fuller privilege is connected a more solemn responsibility; for if "he that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses, of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace?" Heb. x. 28, 29.

THE SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

* * The Capital numerals indicate the number of the Map in which the place will be found: the words in italic are the meanings of the proper names so far as they can be ascertained.

- AB'ANA, or AM'ANA, (the constant), a Syrian river, rising in Mount Hermon, and flowing through the city of Damascus. 2 Kings v. 12. [IV., VI.]
- AB'ARIM, (passages), a chain of mountains in the east of Canaan, the most noted of which were Nebo, Pisgah, and Peor. Num. xxvii. 12. [III., IV., IX.]
- AB'DON, (a servant), a Levitical city in Asher. Josh. xxi. 30.
- A'BEL, (mourning, or plain), a town in Judah. 1 Sam. vi. 18.
- A'BEL-BETH-MA'ACHAH, (plain of the house of Maachah), a town in the north of Canaan. 2 Sam. xx. 14. [IV., VI.]
- A'BEL-MA'IM, (plain of the waters), the same as Abel-Beth-Maachah. 2 Chron. xvi. 4.
- A'BEL-MEHO'LAH, (the plain of weakness), a town in Simeon, and the birth-place of Elisha. Judg. vii. 22. [IV.]
- A'BEL-MIZ'RAIM, (mourning of the Egyptians), a place on the west of the Jordan, where the Egyptians mourned the death of Jacob; previous to which it was known as Atad. Gen. 1. 11.
- A'BEL-SHIT'TIM, (the plain of acacias), a town of Moab, east of the Jordan. Num. xxiv. 1. [IV.]
- A'BEZ, (muddy), a town in Issachar. Josh. xix. 20.
- ABILE'NE, (the father of mourning), a district so called from its chief town Abila, in the north of Palestine, extending southward to Mount Hermon. Luke iii. 1. [VI.]
- AC'CAD, one of the cities built by Nimrod, in Babylon. Gen. x. 20. [I., II.]
- AC'CHO, (enclosed), a seaport on the Mediterranean, in the tribe of Asher; the ancient Ptolemais, and the modern St. Jean d'Acre. Judg. i. 31; Acts xxi. 7. [II., IV., V., IX.]
- ACEL'DAMA, (the field of blood), a plot of ground on the outside of the southern wall of Jerusalem, called also "the potter's field." Matt. xxvii. 8, 10. [VIII.]
- ACHA'IA, a region of Greece (now known as the Morea) occupying the north-western portion of the Peloponnesus; Corinth was its capital. Acts xviii. 12. [II., VII.]
- ACH'METHA (treasury), in Greek authors, Ecbatana, the capital of Media. Ezra vi. 2. [II.]
- A'CHOR, (trouble), a valley near Jericho, on the north of Judah. Josh. vii. 26.
- ACH'SHAPH, a royal city of the Canaanites in Asher. Josh. xi. 1. [IV.]
- ACH'ZIB, a, a town on the sea-coast in Asher; called by the Greeks Ecdippa, now Dsib. Josh. xix. 29. [IV.]—β, a town on the plains of Judah, Josh. xv. 44; Micah i. 14; possibly the same as Chezib. Gen. xxxviii. 5.
- ACRAB'BIM, (scorpions), hills to the south of the Dead Sea, much infested with scorpions, Num. xxxiv. 4; Maaleh-Acrabbim, (ascent or steep of scorpions), Josh. xv. 3. [IV., VI., IX.]
- AD'ADAH, a town in the south of Judah. Josh. xv. 22.
- AD'AM, (earthy), a town on the Jordan. Josh. iii. 16.
- AD'AMAH, (red earth), a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 36.
- AD'AMI, (earthy), a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.
- A'DAR, the same as Hadar-Azzar, a town in Judah. Num. xxxiv. 4.
- ADITHA'IM, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 36.
- AD'MAH, (red earth), one of the cities in the vale of Siddim destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah. Gen. x. 19.
- ADORA'IM, a town in the south of Judah. 2 Chron. xi. 9. [V.]
- ADRAMYT'TIUM, (court of death), a city on the coast of Mysia, Asia Minor. Acts xxvii. 2. [II., VII.]
- A'DRIA, the Adriatic Sea. Acts xxvii. 27. [II., VII.]
- ADUL'LAM, a, a cave. 1 Sam. xxii. 1. [VI.]—β, a royal city of the Canaanites. Josh. xii. 15. [IV., V.]
- ADUM'MIM, an ascending road between Gilgal and Jerusalem, much infested with robbers. Josh. xv. 7.
- AHA'VA, a, an Assyrian town. Ezra viii. 15.—β, the river on which the town stands. Ezra viii. 21, 31.
- AH'LAB, a town in Asher. Judg. i. 31. [IV.]
- A'I, (heap), a, a Canaanitish city in Benjamin.

- Gen. xii. 8, (Hai.) [V.]— β . an Ammonitish city. Jer. xlix. 3.
- AR'YA, the same as Ai, Neh. xi. 31, and Aiath, Isa. x. 28.
- AR'IN, (a fountain), α . a Levitical city in Simeon. Josh. xv. 32.— β . a town in Northern Palestine, near the source of the Jordan. Num. xxxiv. 2. [IV., V., VI.]
- AR'JALON, (strength), α . a valley and Levitical town in Dan. Josh. x. 12: Judg. i. 35, (Aijalon.) [IV., V.]— β . a town in Zebulun. Judg. xii. 12.
- ALAM'MELECH, (God is King), a town in Asher. Josh. xix. 26.
- ALE'METH, a Levitical town in Benjamin, 1 Chron. vi. 60, perhaps the same as Almon, Josh. xxi. 18.
- ALEXAN'DRIA, on the Mediterranean coast, capital of Egypt under the Ptolemies: built by Alexander the Great. Acts xviii. 24. [II., VII.]
- AL'LOH, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.
- AL'MON, (hidden), a Levitical town in Benjamin. Josh. xxi. 18.
- AL'MON DIBLATHA'IM, an Israelitish station in the desert of Sinai, near Moab. Num. xxxiii. 46.
- A'LOTH, a district probably in or near Asher. 1 Kings iv. 16.
- A'LUSH, an Israelitish station on the route to Sinai. Num. xxxiii. 13.
- A'MAD, a town in Asher. Josh. xix. 26.
- AM'ALEK, AM'ALEKITES, (a people that strike), α . an ancient people, the descendants of Esau through Amalek, inhabiting the region south of Palestine; also dwelling on the east of the Dead Sea and Mount Seir. Gen. xiv. 7. [II., III., V.]— β . Amalek, a mountain in Ephraim, on which the city of Pirathon was built. Judg. xii. 15.
- A'MAM, a city in the south of Judah. Josh. xv. 26.
- AM'ANA, see AB'ANA; also an eastern summit of Lebanon. Sol. Song, iv. 8.
- AM'MAH, (my people), a hill where Asahel was slain by Abner. 2 Sam. ii. 24.
- AM'MONITES, (sons of my people), a nation descended from Lot through his son Ammon, inhabiting the region between the rivers Jabbok and Ammon. Gen. xix. 38. [IV., V., VI.]
- A'MORITES, (rebels), the descendants of the fourth son of Canaan, and the most powerful of the Canaanites; a nation dwelling on both sides of the Jordan. Gen. xiv. 7. [III., IV.]
- AMPHIP'OLIS, a city of Greece, and the capital of Macedonia, situated on the river Strymon. Acts xvii. 1. [II., VII.]
- A'NAB, (cluster of grapes), a town in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xi. 21. [V.]
- ANAHAR'RATH, a town in Issachar. Josh. xix. 19.
- AN'AKIM, a Canaanitish nation, remarkable for their stature, who inhabited Hebron and other towns in the south. They consisted of three tribes, named after the sons of Anak. Num. xiii. 22.
- AN'AMIM, a people of Egypt or its vicinity; their exact locality not known. Gen. x. 13. [I.]
- ANANI'AH, a town in Benjamin. Neh. xi. 32.
- AN'ATHOTH, a Levitical town and city of refuge in Benjamin, and birth-place of Jeremiah. Josh. xxi. 18. (1 Chron. xi. 28, Antothite.) [IV., V.]
- AN'NEM, a Levitical city in Issachar. 1 Chron. vi. 73: the same as En-gannim. Josh. xix. 21.
- AN'NER, a Levitical city in Manasseh. 1 Chron. vi. 70.
- AN'NIM, a town in the hill country of Judah. Josh. xv. 50.
- ANTI-LEB'ANON, or ANTI-LIB'ANUS, a range of mountains in the north of Palestine, running nearly parallel to Lebanon, of which the highest point is Mount Hermon, the modern Jebel-esh-sheikh, ten thousand feet high. [VII.]
- AN'TIOCH, α . the capital of Syria, where the disciples were first called Christians. Acts vi. 5; xi. 26. [II., V., VII.]— β . a city of Pisidia, Asia Minor, visited by Paul and Barnabas. Acts xiii. 14. [VII.]
- ANTIPA'TRIS, (against his father), a city built by Herod the Great on the site of Caphar-saba, between Casarea and Lydia. Acts xxiii. 31.
- A'PHAR, APHAR'SITES, a nation of whom a colony was brought to Samaria. Ezra iv. 9.
- APHAR'SACHITES, Ezra v. 6, and Apharsathchites, Ezra iv. 9, two Assyrian nations otherwise unknown, unless they be taken as the same.
- A'PHEK, (a stream), α . a royal Canaanitish city in Issachar. Josh. xii. 18. [IV.]— β . a city in Asher, Josh. xiii. 4; xix. 30; called Aphik. Judg. i. 31. [IV.]— γ . a town in Syria, near which Benhadad was defeated. 1 Kings xx. 26: 2 Kings xiii. 17.
- APHE'KAH, a town in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 53.
- APOLLO'NIA, a city of Macedonia. Acts xvii. 1. [II., VII.]
- AP'PIH-FO'RUM, (village of Appius), a market town in Italy, about fifty miles from Rome, named after Appius Claudius, whose statue was placed here. Acts xxiii. 15. [I., VII.]
- AR, the capital of Moab, situate on the Arnon, called also Rabbah and Ariel. Its later Greek name was Areopolis. Num. xxi. 15, 28. [III., IV.]
- AR'RAB, a town in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 52. Hence probably the Gentile noun Arbete. 2 Sam. xxiii. 35.
- AR'ABAH, in the authorized version, translated "plain," but in the original it has the article as a proper name—the Arabah; the valley of the Jordan prolonged from the Dead Sea to the Elanitic Gulf. Deut. i. 1. (Isa. xxxiii. 9, a wilderness. Auth. Ver.)
- AR'ABAH, or BETH AR'ABAH, a town in Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 18; the inhabitants called Arbathites. 2 Sam. xxiii. 31.
- ARA'BIA, (desert place), "the east country," or properly the south-east country, inhabited chiefly by the descendants of Ishmael, or "children of the east." 1 Kings x. 1. [I., II., III.] (Ezek. xxxviii. 13, Sheba.) See page 11.
- AR'RAD, a Canaanitish town and country in the south of Palestine, Num. xxi. 1. ("The king of Arad," Josh. xii. 14.) [III., IV., V.]

A'RAM, (the high land), a name given to Syria.

See page 15. [II., III.]

a. A'RAM-BETH-REHOB, the same as Beth-Rehob. 2 Sam. x. 8. [II.]

β. A'RAM-DAME'SEK, (i.e.,) Syria of Damascus. 2 Sam. viii. 5, 6. [II., V.]

γ. A'RAM-MA'ACHAH, 1 Chron. xix. 6, or simply Maachah. 2 Sam. x. 6, 8. [II.]

δ. A'RAM-NA'HARA'IM, (Aram of two rivers, i.e., the Euphrates and the Tigris.) See Mesopotamia, p. 10. [II., V.]

e. A'RAM-PA'DAN, (the lowlands of Aram), in Mesopotamia. Gen. xxv. 20. [II.]

ζ. A'RAM-ZO'BAH. See Zobah. [II., V.]

ARA'RAT, (mountain of descent), the name of a district and a mountain in Armenia. Gen. viii. 4. [II.]

AR'BATHI'TES. See Arabah.

AR'CHEVI'TES, the inhabitants of Erech, a city of Babylonia. Ezra iv. 9.

AR'CHI, an unknown place in Palestine, probably in Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 2.

ARRO'AGUS, (the hill of Mars), a hill in Athens, on which a court of justice was held. Acts xvii. 19.

AR'GOB, or GAULONITIS, a fruitful district in Bashan. Deut. iii. 14. [IV., VI.]

ARIMATHE'A, a town near to Ramah, or Ramlet, by some supposed to be the same place. Matt. xxvii. 57. [VI.]

ARK'ITES, a Canaanitish tribe inhabiting a district at the foot of Mount Lebanon. Gen. x. 17. [III., V.]

ARMAGED'DON, conjectured to mean "the Mount of Megiddo," a valley forming the great plain of Esdraelon. Rev. xvi. 16. See Megiddo.

ARNE'NIA, or the land of Ararat. See page 15. [II., VII.]

AR'NON, (leaping for joy), a district and stream in Moab: the present name of the latter is Moojeb. Num. xxi. 13. [IV., V., VI.]

AR'OER, (heath), a. a town on the northern banks of the Arnon. Deut. ii. 36. [IV.]—β. a town on the river of Gad, an arm of the Jab-bok. Num. xxxii. 34.—γ. a town in Simeon. 1 Sam. xxx. 28. (1 Chron. xi. 44, "Aroerite.")

AR'PAD, a town and region in Syria, near Hamath. 2 Kings xviii. 34.

ARPHAX'AD, the third son of Shem, who gave his name to a people or region in Northern Armenia. Gen. x. 22.

AR'UBOTH, a town in Judah. 1 Kings iv. 10.

ARU'MAH, or RU'MAH, a town near Shechem. Judg. ix. 41.

AR'VAD, a maritime city of Phœnicia: Ezek. xxvii. 8; hence the Gentile noun, Arvadite. Gen. x. 18. [II., V.]

A'SHAN, a Levitical city in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 42.

A'SHAN, a Levitical town in Simeon, Josh. xv. 42; xix. 7, (Ashen:) the same as Chor-ashan. 1 Sam. xxx. 30.

ASH'DOD, one of the five chief cities of the Philistines: it was the Azotus of the Greeks and Romans, now an Arab village, called Esdud. Josh. xi. 22. [IV.]

ASH'DOTH-PIS'GAH, a city of Reuben, near Pishgah. Josh. xii. 3.

ASH'ER, (blessedness), a. the son of Jacob, by Zilpah, the father of one of the twelve tribes. Gen. xxx. 13.—β. a town on the borders of Manasseh. Josh. xvii. 7. [IV.]

ASH'KENAZ, a descendant of Japheth, Gen. x. 3, who gave his name to a country mentioned with Ararat and Minni, and to the sea now known as the Black Sea. Jer. li. 27. [I.]

ASH'NAH, the name of two cities in Judah. Josh. xv. 33, 43.

ASH'TAROTH, (flocks), ASH'TEROH-KARNA'IM, a town of Bashan, included in the territory of the half tribe of Manasseh, and assigned to the Levites. Gen. xiv. 5. [II., IV., V., VI.]

A'SIA, that is, Proconsular Asia, a part of Asia Minor. Acts ii. 9. [II., VII.] See p. 33.

AS'KELON, or ASH'KELON, one of the five cities of the Philistines; still called Asculan, (Josh. xiii. 3, Eshkalonite,) Judg. i. 18. [III., IV., V., VI.]

ASSH'UR, a son of Shem, progenitor of the Assyrians. Gen. x. 22. [I.]

ASSH'URIM, an Arabian tribe. Gen. xxv. 3: 2 Sam. ii. 9.

As'sos, a seaport of Lesser Mysia, in the Ægean Sea. Acts xx. 13. [II., VII.]

ASSYR'IA, (happy), an ancient kingdom of Asia. See p. 15. [I., II., V.] ASSYR'IANs. 2 Kings xv. 19, 29.

A'TAD, a threshing-floor, the burial-place of Joseph; afterward called Abel-Mizraim. Gen. l. 10.

AT'AROTH, a. Ataroth-Beth-Joab, in Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 54.—β. Ataroth-addar, in Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 5, 7. [IV.]—γ. Ataroth-Shophan, in Gad. Num. xxxii. 34.—δ. Ataroth, in Reuben. Num. xxxii. 3. [IV.]

A'THACH, a town in Judah. 1 Sam. xxx. 30.

ATH'ENS, the capital of Attica, in Greece. Acts xvii. 16. [II., VII.]

ATH'ERIM, ("the way of the spies," in Auth. Vers.) Num. xxi. 1.

ATTALI'A, a maritime city of Pamphylia, now called Adalia. Acts xiv. 25. [VII.]

A'VA, most probably a Syrian or Mesopotamian town. 2 Kings xvii. 24.

A'VEN, a. the same as On. Ezek. xxx. 17.—β. the same as Beth-aven, Hosea x. 8.—γ. Plain of Aven, some valley near Damascus. Amos i. 5.

A'VIM, a. the inhabitants of Ava. 2 Kings xvii. 31.—β. inhabitants of Philistia. Deut. ii. 23.—γ. a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 23. [III.]

A'VITH, the chief city of Hadad, king of Edom. Gen. xxxvi. 35.

A'ZAL, a place in or near Jerusalem. Zech. iv. 5.

AZE'KAH, (strength of walls), a town in the lowlands of Judah. Josh. x. 10. [IV., V., VI.]

A'ZEM, a place in Simeon. Josh. xv. 29, (1 Chron. iv. 29, Ezem.)

Az'maveth, a city in Judah. Ezra ii. 24.

Az'mon, a place in Judah. Num. xxxiv. 4.

Az'NOTH-RA'BOR, or the southern border of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 34.

Azo'tus. See Ashdod.

Az'ZAH, or GA'ZA, a town in Philistia. Deut. ii. 23.

- BA'AL, (the sun, or lord), a. a town in Simeon, called Baalath-Beer. 1 Chron. iv. 33.—β. a mountain. Num. xxii. 41.
- BA'AL-AM, a. a city of Judah, the same as Baale of Judah, Kirjath-Baal, or Kirjath-Jearim. Josh. xv. 9.—β. a mountain. Josh. xv. 11.
- BA'ALATH, a. in Dan. Josh. xix. 44.—β. a city in Lebanon, built by Solomon. 1 Kings ix. 8. [II., IV., V.]
- BA'ALATH-BE'ER, a town in Simeon. Josh. xix. 8.
- BA'ALBEC, a magnificent city in Cælo-Syria, in which was a celebrated temple dedicated to Baal, or the sun: its ruins show its former splendor: supposed to be mentioned in the Bible under the name of Baal-Gad. [IV., IX.]
- BA'AL-GAD, (idol of the troop), the northern limit of the conquests of Joshua, and an ancient seat of Syrian idolatry; afterward known as Baalbec. Josh. xi. 17. [IV.]
- BA'AL-HAM'ON, a vineyard belonging to Solomon, in the valley of the Lebanon. Sol. Song viii. 11.
- BA'AL-HA'ZOR, in Ephraim, a pasture-ground belonging to Absalom. 2 Sam. xiii. 23. [IV.]
- BA'AL-HER'MON, a mountain near Hermon. Judg. iii. 3. [VI.]
- BA'AL-ME'ON, (the master of the house), or BETH-ME'ON, a town in Reuben. Num. xxxii. 38. [IV.]
- BA'AL-PE'OR, a mountain of the range Abarim. Num. xxiii. 28.
- BA'AL-PER'AZIM, (master of divisions), a mountain on the south of Jerusalem. 2 Sam. v. 20: 1 Chron. xiv. 11.
- BA'AL-SHAL'ISHA, (the third idol), a town in the plains of Sharon, near Gilgal. 2 Kings iv. 42.
- BA'AL-TA'MAR, (master of the palm tree), a village in Benjamin. Judg. xx. 33.
- BA'AL-ZE'PHON, (idol of the north), a promontory of the Red Sea, on which an idol-temple was erected. Exod. xiv. 2: Num. xxxiii. 7.
- BA'BEL, BAB'YLON, (city of confusion), (See She-shach, Shinar), the metropolis of the Babylonian empire, situate on the river Euphrates, and celebrated for its great extent, strength, and opulence: it is often used in a wider sense for the Persian empire. Gen. x. 10; xi. 9. [I., II.]
- BA'CA, (mulberry trees), a valley, by some placed in the northern part of Palestine, by others near to Jerusalem. Psa. lxxxiv. 6.
- BAHU'RIM, a place not far from Jerusalem, beyond the Mount of Olives. 2 Sam. iii. 16. (2 Sam. xxiii. 31, Barhumite;) (1 Chron. xi. 33, Baharumite.)
- BA'LAH, a place in Simeon. Josh. xix. 3.
- BA'MOTH, BA'MOTH-BA'AL, a town in Reuben. Num. xxi. 19. (The high places of Baal, Josh. xiii. 17.)
- BA'SHAN, the northern part of the region beyond Jordan, called Batanea by the Greek writers: the modern name is el-Beteneyh. Num. xxi. 33. [II., III., IV., V.]
- BA'SHAN-HA'VOth-JA'IR, (the villages of Jair), sixty walled cities in the country of Argob, in Bashan. Deut. iii. 4, 14
- BATH-RAB'BIM, a valley or tower. Sol. Song vii. 4.
- BE'ALOTH, in Judah, Josh. xv. 24; or "in Al-oth." 1 Kings iv. 16.
- BE'ER, (the well), a. a town in Benjamin. Judg. ix. 21. [IV.]—β. same as Beer-elim, in Moab, an Israelitish station. Num. xxi. 16
- BE'ER-E' LIM, (the well of the mighty ones), a well dug by the staves of the Israelitish princes.
- BE'ER-LAHA'I-ROI, (the well of him that sees me), a fountain in the wilderness near to Shur, Gen. xvi. 14; xxiv. 62, ("the well Lahai-roi;" xxv. 11.)
- BEE'ROTH, a city in Benjamin, about eight miles from Jerusalem. Josh. xviii. 25. [V.]
- BEE'ROTH-BE'NE-JA'AKAN, (Beeroth of the children of sorrow). Deut. x. 6.
- BE'ER-SHE'BA, (well of the oath), a town on the southern border of Palestine, which still retains its ancient name, and possesses two wells of excellent water. Gen. xxi. 14. [III., IV., V., VI., IX.]
- BEESH'TERAH, perhaps the same as Ashtaroth, a Levitical city in Manasseh. Josh. xxi. 27.
- BE'LA-ZO'AR, the smallest of the cities of the plain of Sodom. Gen. xiv. 2.
- BEN-EB'ERAK, a town in Dan. Josh. xix. 45.
- BE'NE-JA'AKAN. See Beeroth.
- BEN'JAMIN, (son of the right hand), a tribal division of Canaan, given to the descendants of the youngest son of Jacob. Josh. xviii. 11. [IV.]
- BE'ON, a district on the east of the Jordan. Num. xxxii. 3.
- BER'ACHAH, (valley of blessing), in Judah. 2 Chron. xx. 26.
- BERE'A, a city of Macedonia, afterward called Irenopolis, and now Boor. Acts xvii. 10. [II., VII.]
- BE'RED, in the wilderness of Sheor. Gen. xvi. 14.
- BET'OTHAI, (wells), a city in Syria, conquered by David. 2 Sam. viii. 8.
- BE'SOR, a stream in the south of Judah that enters the Mediterranean Sea near Gaza. 1 Sam. xxx. 9.
- BE'TAH, a city in Syria. 2 Sam. viii. 8. [V.]
- BE'TEN, a city in Asher. Josh. xix. 25.
- BETHAB'ARA, (house of passage), a village and ford on the Jordan, near Jericho, where John baptized. John i. 28.
- BETH'ANATH, (house of affliction), a town in Naphthali. Josh. xix. 38. [IV.]
- BETH'ANOTH, (house of waters), a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 59.
- BETH'ANY, (house of song), a town or village on the eastern side of the Mount of Olives, about fifteen furlongs E. S. E. from Jerusalem. Matt. xxvi. 6. [V., VI.]
- BETH-AR'ABAH, (house of the plain), a town on the borders of Judah and Benjamin. Josh. xv. 6, 61.
- BETH-AR'AM, a town in Gad. Josh. xiii. 27. [IV.]
- BETH-AR'BEL, (house of the ambush), called also Arbela: a wild region, filled with caves, on the western shore of the sea of Galilee, formerly the haunt of robbers. Hos. x. 14.
- BETH-A'VEN, (house of idolatry), a. a town in Benjamin. Josh. vii. 2.—β. a wilderness. Josh. xviii. 12.—γ. a name given to Beth-

- any when it became an idolatrous city. Hos. iv. 15.
- BETH-AZ'MAVETH, (house of the strength of death,) a town in Judah or Benjamin, near Jerusalem, Neh. vii. 28; or simply Azmaveth. Neh. xii. 29.
- BETH-BA'AL-ME'ON, or BA'AL-ME'ON, (house of the idol,) a city in Reuben. Josh. xiii. 17.
- BETH-BA'RA, the same as Bethabara. Judg. vii. 24.
- BETH-BIR'EI, in the tribe of Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 31.
- BETH-CAR, (house of pasture,) a town in the south of Palestine, near Mizpeh. 1 Sam. vii. 11.
- BETH-DA'GON, (house of Dagon, or the fish,) a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 41.— β . a town near to Joppa. Josh. xix. 27. [IV., V.]
- BETH-DIBLATHA'IM, (house of dry figs,) a town of the Moabites. Jer. xlviii. 22.
- BETH-E'DEN, (house of Eden,) near Damascus. Amos i. 5.
- BETH-E'KED, or "shearing-house." 2 Kings x. 12.
- BETH'EL, (the house of God,) previously called Luz, (see also Beth-aven,) in the tribe of Benjamin, situate between two valleys on the road to Shechem. Gen. xii. 8. It was also called Beth-ar. [IV., V., VI.] Mount Bethel. Josh. xvi. 1.
- BETH-E'MEK, a town in Asher. Josh. xix. 27.
- BETHES'DA, (house of mercy,) a pool near the sheep-gate of Jerusalem. John v. 2. [VIII.]
- BETH-E'ZEL, (house of the neighbor,) a village near Samaria. Micah i. 11.
- BETH-GA'DER, the same as Gederah, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 36.
- BETH-GA'MUL, (house of the camel,) a town in Moab. Jer. xlviii. 23. [IV.]
- BETH-HAC'EREM, (house of the vineyard,) a hill in Judah. Neh. iii. 14.
- BETH-HA'MERCHAK, "a place that was far off." 2 Sam. xv. 17.
- BETH-HA'NAN, (ELON-BETH-HANAN, Auth. Vers.,) a town in Judah or Dan. 1 Kings iv. 9.
- BETH-HA'RAM, BETH-HA'RAM, a town in Gad. Num. xxxii. 36. [IV., V.]
- BETH-HOG'LAH, a town of the Benjamites, on the borders of Judah, now called Hajlah. Josh. xv. 6.
- BETH-HO'RON, (house of liberty,) a double city between Lydda and Jerusalem: α . the upper, a Levitical city in Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 5.— β . the lower city. Josh. x. 10. [IV., V., VI.]
- BETH-JES'IMOTH, (house of the deserts,) a town of the Reubenites, on the Jordan, afterward belonging to the Moabites. Num. xxxiii. 49.
- BETH-LEB'AOTH, (house of lionesses,) a town in Simeon. Josh. ix. 6.
- BETH-LEHEM, (house of bread,) α . Bethlehem Judah, or Bethlehem Ephratah; a village six miles from Jerusalem. Gen. xxxv. 19. [IV., V., VI., IX.]— β . a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 15.
- BETH-MA'ACHAH, (house of bruising,) the same as Abel Beth-Maachah, in Naphtali. 2 Sam. xx. 14.
- BETH-MAR'CABOTH, (house of chariots,) a town in Simeon. Josh. xix. 5.
- BETH-ME'ON, (house of habitation,) same as Bethbaal-meon. Josh. xiii. 17. Its ruins are called Miun.
- BETH-MIL'LO. See Millo.
- BETH-NIM'RAH, (house of limpid water,) a town in the tribe of Gad, Num. xxxii. 36; "waters of Nimrim." Is. xv. 6. [IV., VI.]
- BETH-PA'LET, (house of escape,) in Judah. Josh. xv. 27. (Neh. xi. 26, Beth-phelet.)
- BETH-PAZ'ZEZ, (house of dispersion,) a town in Issachar. Josh. xix. 21.
- BETH-PE'OR, or BA'AL-PE'OR, a Midianitish town near the Jordan. Deut. iv. 46. [VI.]
- BETH'PHAGE, (house of figs,) a small village between Jericho and Bethany, Matt. xxi. 1.
- BETH'REHOB (house of breadth,) a town in Asher. Judg. xviii. 28.
- BETH-SA'IDA, (house of fish,) α . a town in Galilee on the western side of the sea of Tiberias, and not far from Capernaum, John i. 44. [VI.]— β . a town on the eastern side of the Lake of Tiberias, in Lower Gaulonitis: rebuilt not long after the birth of Christ by Philip the Tetrarch, and called Julias, in honor of Julia, daughter of Augustus. Luke xi. 10. [VI.]—However, neither the sacred writers, nor any other ancient authors, intimate that there were two Bethsaidas. The only ground for the opinion is, that the miracle of feeding the five thousand is said by Luke to have been performed in a desert place belonging to the city called Bethsaida, which, from John vi. 1, 17, we know was east of the Jordan and the lake; and Mark says, after the miracle, Christ "constrained his disciples to get into the ship, and to go to the other side before unto Bethsaida, while he sent away the people." But this mention of Bethsaida, without any note of distinction, while he was in the neighborhood, just east of "the city called Bethsaida," would lead us to conclude that this was the place which he meant. Hence the margin reads, "over against Bethsaida." Newcome says, "The disciples should go before Jesus in their voyage to the other side of the lake, onward, as far as to Bethsaida. They were to make Bethsaida in their passage, at which place it was understood Jesus was to meet them by land, and then to embark with them." It was called "Bethsaida of Galilee," though it was in Gaulonitis, as this province was still commonly reckoned in Galilee. Josephus calls Judas the Gaulonite, from Gemala, Judas the Galilean.
- BETH-SHE'AN, (house of rest,) or BETH'SHAN, a town in Manasseh, afterward called Scythopolis, and now Beisan by the Arabs. Josh. xvii. 11, 16. [IV., V.]
- BETH-SHEMESH, (house of the sun,) α . a city of refuge, and Levitical city in Judah. Josh. xv. 10. [IV., V.]— β . a town in Issachar. Josh. xix. 22.— γ . in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 38.— δ . an Egyptian city, the same as On, or Heliopolis, or "city of the sun," in Egypt. Jer. xliii. 13. [V.]
- BETH-SHIT'TAH, (house of the acacia,) a town in Issachar, between Bethlshan and Abel-meholah. Judg. vii. 22. [IV., VI.]
- BETH-TAP'PUAH, (house of apples,) a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 53. [V.]
- BE'THUL, or BETHU'EL, a town in Simeon. Josh. xix. 4.

- BETH'ZUR, (house of the rock), a town in the mountains of Judah fortified by Rehoboam. Josh. xv. 58. [IV., V., VI.]
- BE'TONIM, (pistacias), a border town in Gad. Josh. xiii. 26.
- BE'ZEK, (lightning), a city of the Canaanites, in the valley of the Jordan. 1 Sam. xi. 8. [IV.]
- BE'ZER, city of refuge in the tribe of Reuben. Deut. iv. 43. [IV.]
- BIL'EAM, a Levitical city in Manasseh. 1 Chron. vi. 70.
- BI'THAH, same as Balah, a town in Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 29.
- BITH'RON, a district in Perea. 2 Sam. ii. 29.
- BITHYN'IA, a province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by the Euxine Sea and the Propontis. Acts xvi. 7. [II., VII.]
- BIZJOTH'JAH, a town in the south of Judah. Josh. xv. 28.
- BO'CHIM, (weepings), a place probably near Shiloh. Judg. ii. 1, 5. [IV.]
- BO'HAN, (a thumb), a boundary-stone between Judah and Benjamin. Josh. xv. 6.
- BORHAS'RA, "the well of Sirah," Auth. Vers., 2 Sam. iii. 26.
- BO'ZEZ, a rock in the pass Michmash, in the tribe of Benjamin. 1 Sam. xiv. 4.
- BOZ'KATH, in Judah. Josh. xv. 39. (2 Kings xxii. 1, Boscath.)
- BOZ'RAH, (distress), the Bostra of the Greeks and Romans, in Auranitis. Gen. xxxvi. 33. (1 Chron. i. 44, Bosrah.) Some suppose it was the same as el-Busaireh, a village and castle in Arabia Petraea, south-east of the Dead Sea. [II., III., IV., V., VI., VII.]
- BUZ, a people and region in Arabia Deserta. Jer. xxv. 23. (Job xxxii. 2, Buzite.)
- CAB'BON, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 40: probably the same place as Machbenah.
- CA'BUL, (insignificant), a. a town in Asher. Josh. xix. 27.—β. a region in Galilee containing twenty cities, given by Solomon to Hiram. 1 Kings ix. 13. [IV., V.]
- CESARE'A PALESTI'NA, a city built on the shores of the Mediterranean by Herod the Great, 22 B. C.: the Roman metropolis of Palestine, and the residence of the Procurator. Acts ix. 30. [VII.]
- CESARE'A PHILIP'PI, a city near the springs of the Jordan, and originally called Baniyas, but enlarged by Philip the Tetrarch, who called it Cæsarea, in honor of the Emperor Tiberias, adding his own name to distinguish it from the other Cæsarea: it lay about one hundred and twenty miles north of Jerusalem. Matt. xvi. 13. [VI.]
- CAIN, (possession), a town in the hill country of Judah. Josh. xv. 57.
- CA'LAH, a city of Assyria, built by Asher or Nimrod, now called Hatreh. Gen. x. 11.
- CA'LEB, or CA'LEB-EPH'RATAH, (as the heart), a town or district in Judah. 1 Sam. xxx. 14.
- CAL'NEH, or CAL'NO, an Assyrian city, probably the same place that was afterward called Ctesiphon, on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite Seleucia. Gen. x. 10. (II.)
- CAL'VARY, (place of a skull.) See p. 40.
- CA'MON, a town in Gilead. Judg. x. 5.
- CA'NA, (the nest), a. a town in Galilee, near Capernaum. John ii. 1. ("Simon the Canaanite," more correctly Cananite, Mark iii. 18.)—β. or Kanah, in Asher. Josh. xix. 28. [IV., VI.]—γ. or Kanah, a stream on the confines of Ephraim and Manasseh. Josh. xvi. 8. [IV., VI.]
- CA'NAAN, (merchant), the name of western Palestine and Phœnicia, previous to its occupation by the Israelites: CA'NAANITES, Gen. x. 6. [I., II., III.] (Hos. xii. 7, "a merchant," Auth. Vers.)
- CAN'NEH, probably the same as Calneh. Ezek. xxvii. 23.
- CAPER'NAUM, (city of comfort), a populous city on the north-western shore of the Lake of Genesareth. The site of this place is uncertain. Matt. iv. 13. [VI.]
- CAPH'TOR, probably Crete, though the ancient translators understand it to mean Cappadocia. Deut. ii. 23. [I., II., VII.]
- CAPH'TORIM, the Philistines, who came originally from Crete. Deut. ii. 23.
- CAPPADO'CIA, an eastern province of Asia Minor, bordering on Armenia. Acts ii. 9. [II., VII.]
- CAR'MEL, (fruitful field, or vineyard of God), a. a range of hills extending north-west from the plain of Esdraelon, and ending in a promontory forming the Bay of Acre. Josh. xii. 26. [II., III., IV., V., VI., IX.] (Jer. iv. 26, "the fruitful place," Auth. Vers.)—β. a town in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 55. [IV., V., VI.]
- CASIPH'IA, a place in the north-east of Media. Ezra viii. 17.
- CAS'LUHIM, descendants of Mizraim, who abode near Colchis. Gen. x. 14. [I.]
- CE'DRON. See Kidron.
- CEN'CHREA, one of the ports of Corinth. Acts xviii. 18. [II., VII.]
- CHAL'DEA, CHAL'DEES, (Chasdim, Heb.), the region and inhabitants of Babylonia; but in a wider sense Chaldea comprehended Mesopotamia. Gen. xi. 28. [II.] See pp. 10, 16.
- CHAR'AN. See Haran. [II.]
- CHAR'CHEMISH, a fortified city on an island formed near the junction of the Chebar and the Euphrates. It was taken both by Pharaoh-Necho and Nebuchadnezzar; was called by the Greeks, Kirkesion; by the Romans, Circesium; and by the Arabs, Kerkesiyeh. 2 Chron. xxxv. 20. [II., V.]
- CHE'BAR, (strength), a navigable river of Mesopotamia, known to the Greeks as the Chaboras, and now called the Khabour. Ezek. i. 1. [II.]
- CHE'PHAR-HAAM'MONAI, (village of the Ammonites), a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 24.
- CHEPHI'RAH, a town of the Hivites, afterward in the territory of the Benjamites. Josh. ix. 17.
- CHE'R'ETHITE, or CHER'ETHIM, the Philistines, 1 Sam. xxx. 14.
- CHE'RITH, (slaying), a brook on the east of the Jordan. 1 Kings xvii. 3. [VI.]
- CHES'ALON, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 10.
- CHE-SIL, a town in the south of Judah. Josh. xv. 30.
- CHESUL'LOTH, a town in Issachar. Josh. xix. 18.
- CHE'ZIB, in the lowlands of Judah, perhaps the same as Achsib. Gen. xxxviii. 5.
- CHI'DON, the same as Perez-uzza. 1 Chron. xiii. 9

THIL'MAD, a town or region mentioned together with Assyria. Ezek. xxvii. 23.

CHIN'NERETH, a lake or sea in Palestine. See p. 42. Num. xxxiv. 11. (1 Kings xv. 20, Cinneroth.) [II., III., IV., V., VII.]

CHI'OS, a populous and fertile island in the Ionian archipelago, now Scio. Acts. xx. 15. [II., VII.]

CHIS'LOTH-TA'BOR, a fortified city at the foot of Mount Tabor, on the eastern boundary of Zebulun. Josh. xix. 12, 22.

CHIT'TIM, or KIT'TIM, the island of Cyprus, and in a wider sense the islands of the Mediterranean. Num. xxiv. 24. [I., II., VII.]

CHORA'SHAN, 1 Sam. xxx. 30, probably the same as Ashan, in Simeon. Josh. xv. 42.

CHORA'ZIN, (the secret), a town of Galilee near the Lake Tiberias: no traces of it now exist. Matt. xi. 21. [VI.]

CHUB, probably Nubia. Ezek. xxx. 5.

CHUN, a Phœnician city, probably the modern Beirut. 1 Chron. xviii. 8.

CILI'CIA, a province in the south of Asia Minor. Acts vi. 9; xv. 23. [II., VII.]

CLAU'DA, a small island off the south-west coast of Crete, also called Gaudos, and now bears the name of Gozzo. Acts xxvii. 16. [II., VII.]

CNI'DUS, or GNI'DUS, a town and peninsula of Doris, in the Ægean Sea. Acts xxvii. 7. [II., VII.]

COLOS'SE, a city of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, now Konos. Col. i. 2. [II., VII.]

CO'OS, a small island near the coast of Caria, now called Stan-co, or Stanchio. Acts xxi. 1. [II., VII.]

COR'INTH, a commercial city, the capital of Achaia, and the residence of a Roman consul on the isthmus of the Peloponnesus, between the Ægean and Ionian Seas. Acts xviii. 1. [II., VII.]

CRETE, one of the largest and most fruitful islands in the Mediterranean, now called Candia, and by the Turks, Kirid. Acts ii. 11. [II., VII.]

CUSH, (black), or ETHIOPIA, Gen. x. 6, embracing part of Arabia, together with Abyssinia and Nubia: the name was sometimes used to denote all those who lived south of Palestine. [I.]

CU'SHAN, a district in Arabia. Hab. iii. 7.

CU'THAH, or CUTH, a district in Babylonia. 2 Kings xvii. 24. [II.]

CR'PRUS, a large island in the Mediterranean, formerly called Chittim, now Kebris by the Turks. Acts iv. 36. [II., VII.]

CYRE'NE, a city in Upper Lybia, once a seat of Jewish learning. Matt. xxvii. 32. [II., VII.]

DAB'BASHETH, (flowing with honey), a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 11.

DAB'ERETH, a Levitical city in Zebulun, Josh. xix. 12; (xxi. 28, Dabareh.) [IV.]

DALMANU'THA, a village near Magdala, on the shores of the sea of Galilee. Mark viii. 10.

DALMA'TIA, a district on the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea. 2 Tim. iv. 10. [II., VII.]

DAMAS'CUS, a very ancient city, the capital of Syria, situated in a plain at the eastern foot of Anti-Libanus. Gen. xiv. 15. [II., III., IV., V., VI., VII., IX.]

DAM'MIM. See Ephes-dammim.

DAN, (he that judges), α . one of the twelve tribes. Josh. xix. 48. [IV.]— β . a town in the north of the Holy Land, in the tribe of Naphtali, the same as Leshem, or Laish. Josh. xix. 47. [IV., V., VI.]

DAN-JA'AN, probably the same as the preceding. 2 Sam. xxiv. 6.

DAN'NAH, a city of Judah. Josh. xv. 49.

DEAD SEA. See page 44. [IX.]

DE'BIR, a Levitical town in Judah, thirty miles south-west from Jerusalem: also called Kirjath-sepher, and Kirjath-sannah. Josh. x. 38. [IV., V., VI.]

DECAP'OLIS, (ten cities), a district in the north-east of Palestine, containing ten cities. Matt. iv. 25.

DED'ANIM, α . a people near the Arabian Sea, descended from a son of Cush: they spread toward northern Arabia. Gen. x. 7. [I., II.]— β . a people in Idumæa, descended from the second son of Jokshan, Abraham's son by Keturah. Gen. xxv. 3.

DEHA'VITES, a people tributary to the Persians, residing on the high lands near the Caspian Sea. Ezra iv. 9.

DER'BE, a small town of Lycaonia, at the foot of the Taurian mountains. Acts xiv. 6. [II., VII.]

DIBLATHA'TIM. See Almon-diblathaim.

DI'BON, or DI'BON-GAD, α . a city built by the Gadites, but belonging to Reuben. Num. xxi. 30. [IV., VI.]— β . a town in Judah, (probably the same as that called Dimonah in Josh. xiii. 26.) Neh. xi. 25.

DIL'EAN, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 38.

DIM'NAH, a Levitical city in Zebulun. Josh. xxi. 35.

DIMO'NAH. See Dibon.

DI'NAITES, an Assyrian people. Ezra iv. 9.

DIN'HABAHA, an Idumæan town. Gen. xxxvi. 32.

DIZ'AHAB, (a place abounding with gold), in the desert of Sinai: probably the same as Dehab, on the western shore of the Elanitic gulf. Deut. i. 1.

DOD'ANIM, or ROD'ANIM, descendants of Japheth. Gen. x. 4: 1 Chron. i. 7.

DOPH'KAH, a station of the Israelites in the wilderness of Sin. Num. xxxiii. 12. [III.]

DOR, the city of a Canaanitish king, in the heritage of Manasseh. A village exists on its site, called Tortura. Josh. xi. 2. [III., IV., VI.]

DO'THAN, (well), DO'THAIM, (two wells), a place north of Shechem. Gen. xxxviii. 17. [III.]

DU'MAH, α . an Arabian tribe. Gen. xxv. 14.— β . a town in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 52. [I., II.]

DU'RA, a plain in Babylonia. Dan. iii. 1. [II.]

E'BAL, (a heap), a mountain forming one side of the valley that contained the town of Shechem, now Nablus, and opposite to Mount Gerizim. Deut. xi. 29. [IV., VI., IX.]

EB'EN-E'ZER, (stone of help), a memorial stone erected by Samuel at Mizpeh. 1 Sam. iv. 1.

EB'ER, a district peopled by the descendants of Shem. Gen. x. 21. [I.]

- EBRO'NAH, a station in the wilderness. Num. xxxiii. 34.
- E'DAR, (a flock), a town in Judah. Gen. xxxv. 21.
- E'DEN, (pleasure, or delight), a. the site of Paradise: its locality is uncertain. Gen. ii. 8.—β. a district of Mesopotamia or Assyria. 2 Kings xix. 12.
- E'DOM, (red), IDUMÆ'A. The country of the Edomites consisted of the mountainous tract between the Dead Sea and the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea, afterward called Gebalene, now Jebel. Gen. xxxii. 3. [II., III., IV., V., VII.]
- ED'REI, a. the ancient metropolis of Bashan, situated in a deep valley. Its site, called Draa, is covered with ruins. Num. xxi. 33. [IV.]—β. a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 37.
- EO'LAIM, (two pools), a village in the land of Moab. Isa. xv. 8.
- EO'LON, a Canaanitish city in Judah. Josh. x. 3, 34. [III., IV., V., VI.]
- E'GYPT, (Miz'RAIM, Heb.), called also "the land of Ham." Gen. x. 6. See page 13. Gen. xii. 10, 14. [I., II., III., VII.]
- EK'RON, one of the five principal cities of the Philistines. Its site is supposed to be now occupied by a small Moslem village called Akri, five miles south of Ramleh. Josh. xiii. 3. [IV., V., VI.]
- E'LAN, (an oak), the valley in which the Israelites encamped when David fought with Goliath. 1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19. [V.]
- E'LAM, a part of the kingdom of Persia, the ancient Suisiana, now called Kuzistan; and the Elymais of the Greeks and Romans. E'LAMITES, descendants of Shem. See page 18. Gen. x. 22. [I., II.]
- E'LATH, or E'LOTH, called by the Greeks and Romans Elana: a city of Idumæa, having a port on the eastern arm of the Red Sea, called from it the Elanitic Gulf, the modern Gulf of Akaba. Deut. ii. 8. [II., III.]
- ELÆ'LEH, now called El-al, (the height), a town in Reuben, north-east of Heshbon. The ruins are called El-aal. Num. xxii. 37. [IV.]
- E'LEPH, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 28.
- E'LIM, an Israelitish station. Exod. xv. 27. (Isa. xv. 8, Beer Elim.) [IV.]
- ELI'SHAH, a son of Javan, who gave name to the "Isles of Elishah," a region of the Mediterranean, (some suppose the Peloponnesus,) whence purple was brought to Tyre. Gen. x. 4.
- EL'KOSH, the modern Alkosh, in Assyria, near Mosul. Nah. i. 1.
- EL'LASSER, a territory near Babylonia and Elymais: perhaps the same as Thelasser. Gen. xiv. 1. [II.]
- E'LOH, (a grove), a. a town in the tribe of Dan, Josh. xix. 43. (1 Kings iv. 9, Elon-beth-hanan.)—β. probably Mealon in Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33, ("from Allon," Auth. Vers.)
- EL'TEKH, a Levitical city in the tribe of Dan. Josh. xix. 44.
- EL'TEKON, a town of Judah. Josh. xv. 59.
- EL'TOLAD, or TO'LAD, in Judah, but belonging to Simeon. Josh. xv. 30.
- E'MIMS, an ancient gigantic race, who originally occupied the land of Moab. Gen. xiv. 5. [III.]
- EM'MAUS, (warm baths), a village about seven miles from Jerusalem. Luke xxiv. 13. [V., VI.]
- E'NAM, (two fountains), in Judah. Josh. xv. 34.
- EN'DOR, (fountain of generation), in Manasseh. Josh. xvii. 11. [III., IV., VI.]
- EN-EGLA'IM, (fountain of two calves), a town of Moab. Ezek. xlvii. 10.
- EN-GAN'NIM, (garden fountain), a town in the tribe of Judah, near Bethel. Josh. xv. 34. [IV.]
- EN'GEDDI, (fountain of the kid): the more ancient name was Hazezon-Tamar, a town in the wilderness of Judah, now called Ain-Jidy. Josh. xv. 62. [IV., VI.]
- EN-HAD'DA, (fountain of swiftness), in the tribe of Issachar. Josh. xix. 21.
- EN-HAK'KORE, in Simeon. Judg. xv. 19.
- EN-HA'ZOR, (fountain of enclosure), in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 37.
- EN-MISH'PAT, (fountain of judgment), or KA'DESH: probably the same as Meribah. Gen. xiv. 7.
- E'NOCH, (dedicated), a city built by Cain, and named after his son. Gen. iv. 17.
- E'NON, (the place of springs), a small town on the western side of the Jordan, near Mount Gilboa. John iii. 23. [VI.]
- EN-RIM'MON, (fountain of the pomegranate), a town in Judah. Neh. xi. 29.
- EN-RO'GEL, (the fuller's fountain), the fountain of Nehemiah, on the north-east of Jerusalem. 2 Sam. xvii. 17. [IV., VIII.]
- EN'SHEMESH, (fountain of the sun), a town with a stream on the borders of Judah and Benjamin. Josh. xv. 7.
- EN-TAP'PUAH, (fountain of the apple), a town on the borders of Manasseh and Ephraim. Josh. xvii. 7.
- E'PHAI, a district belonging to a Midianitish tribe, near the shores of the Dead Sea. Gen. xxv. 4.
- E'PHES-DAM'MIM, a place in the tribe of Judah. 1 Sam. xvii. 1: (called in 1 Chron. xi. 13, Pas-dammim.)
- EPH'ESUS, the capital of Ionia, and, under the Romans, of Proconsular Asia. Acts xviii. 21, 24. [II., VII.]
- E'PHRAIM, a. a tribal division of Canaan. Josh. xvi. 5-10. [IV.]—β. a mountain, or mountain range. Josh. xvii. 15. [IV., V., VI., IX.]—γ. a forest or wood on the east of Jordan. 2 Sam. xviii. 6.—δ. a city near the wilderness of Judea. 2 Sam. xiii. 23. [IV., VI.]—ε. a name given to the kingdom of Israel. Isa. ix. 9.
- EPH'RATAH, EPH'RATH, (the fruitful), or BETH'LEHEM EPH'RATAH, the ancient name of Bethlehem in Judah. Gen. xxxv. 19. [V.]
- E'PHRON, a. a mountain on the border of Judah and Benjamin. Josh. xv. 9.—β. a town on the borders of Benjamin. 2 Chron. xiii. 19.
- E'RECH, a city in Babylonia: probably the same as Areca. Gen. x. 10. [I.]
- E'SEK, (strife), one of the wells dug by Isaac. Gen. xxvi. 20.
- ESH'COL, (a bunch of grapes), a valley between Hebron and Jerusalem, which is still distinguished for its vineyards. Num. xiii. 24. [III., V.]

E'SHEAN, in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 52.
 ESH'TAOL, in the tribe of Dan Josh. xv. 38. [IV.]
 ESH'TEMOH, or ESHTEMO'A, a Levitical town in Judah. Josh. xv. 50. [IV., V., VI.]
 E'TAM, or E'THAM, a. a town in Judah. 1 Chron. iv. 32. [IV., V.]— β . a rock near the town. Judg. xv. 8. Etham, (end of the sea), a station of the Israelites on the edge of the wilderness. Exod. xiii. 20. [II.]
 E'THER, in the tribe of Simeon. Josh. xv. 42; xix. 7.
 ETHIO'PIA, (blackness), a name given to several countries in Africa. See Cush, and p. 19.
 EUPHRA'TES, (that makes fruitful), the most considerable stream in Western Asia, and therefore frequently designated "the river," or "the great river." Gen. ii. 14; xv. 18. [II., V., VII.]
 E'ZEL, (departure), a stone. 1 Sam. xx. 19.
 E'ZEM, a town in the tribe of Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 29.
 E'ZION-GE'BER, a station of the Israelites on the Red Sea, and afterward a maritime city of some importance, called by the Greeks, Berenice. Num. xxxiii. 35. [II., III.]
 FAIR-HA'VENS, a small bay to the north-east of Cape Matula, in the island of Crete, which remains the Greek name of Kalos Limenas. Acts xxvii. 8. [II., VII.]
 GA'ASH, a hill in Ephraim. Josh. xxiv. 30. (2 Sam. xxiii. 30, "the brooks of Gaash.") GA'BA, or GE'BA, a Levitical city in Benjamin, near Jerusalem. Josh. xviii. 24.
 GAB'BATHA, (elevated), probably a tessellated pavement outside the prætorium of the Roman governor. John xix. 13.
 GAD, (a band, a troop), a. a tribal division of Canaan. Josh. xiii. 24-28. [IV.]— β . a name given to the brook Jabbok. 2 Sam. xxiv. 5.
 GADARE'NES, the inhabitants of Gadara, the chief city of Peræa, near the southern extremity of the Sea of Galilee. Mark v. 1. [VI.]
 GALA'TIA, a province of Asia Minor. Acts xvi. 6. [II., VII.]
 GAL'ILEE, (district), the northernmost of the three principal divisions of Palestine. Matt. iv. 15. See p. 31. [V., VI.]
 GAL'ILEE, SEA OF, LAKE OF GENNES'ARET, or TIBE'RIAS. Matt. iv. 18. See p. 42. [II., VI., IX.]
 GAL'ILIX, a town of the Benjamites, north of Jerusalem. 1 Sam. xxv. 44.
 GA'REB, (scratch, or scrape), a hill near Jerusalem. Jer. xxxi. 39. See p. 41. [VIII.]
 GATH, (a press), one of the five royal cities of the Philistines. Josh. xi. 22. [IV., V., VI.]
 GATH-HE'PHER, or GIT'TAH-HE'PHER, the birth-place of the prophet Jonah, in the tribe of Zebulun. Josh. xix. 13. [IV.]
 GATH-RIM'MON, (the granite press), a. a Levitical city in the tribe of Dan. Josh. xix. 45. [IV., V.]— β . another city in the tribe of Manasseh, though the preceding may be the same. Josh. xxi. 25. The LXX. has "Jebatha."
 GA'ZA, (strong), or AZ'ZA, one of the five cities of the Philistines, on the southern border of Palestine. Here Samson pulled down the idol-temple on himself and his enemies. A village about ten miles distant is still called Samson; in Arabic, Simsim. Gen. x. 19. [II., III., IV., V., VI., VII.]
 GA'ZER, or GE'ZER, a royal city of the Canaanites, included in the allotment to Ephraim as a Levitical town. Josh. xvi. 3. [V.]
 GE'BA, or GA'BA, a town near Shechem. Josh. xxi. 17. Gebais also used for Gibeah, which see.
 GE'BAL, a city in Phœnicia, called Byblos by the Greeks, Gabale by the Romans, and now known by the name of Jebail. (The inhabitants are called Giblites, Josh. xiii. 5, but the word is translated "stone-squarers" in 1 Kings v. 18.) Ezek. xxvii. 9. [V.]
 GE'BIM, a town in Judah. Isa. x. 31.
 GE'DER, an ancient town of the Canaanites, in the plain country of Judah, probably the same as Gederah and Beth-Geder. Josh. xii. 13.
 GEDEROTHA'IM, in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 41.
 GE'DOR, a town in the hill country of Judah. Josh. xv. 58.
 GEHEN'NA. See Hinnom. [VIII.]
 GENNES'ARET, (garden of the prince), Matt. xiv. 34. See p. 42.
 GE'RAR, a town of the Philistines. Gen. x. 19. [III., IV., V., VI.]
 GERGESH'NES, the inhabitants of one of the cities of Decapolis, called Gergesa, though some consider this place to be the same as Gadara. Matt. viii. 28. [VI.]
 GER'IZIM, a mountain of Samaria, opposite to Mount Ebal, on the western side of the valley in which Shechem is situate. Deut. xi. 29. [IV., VI., IX.]
 GE'SHUR, (the vale of the ox), a. a district of Syria, between Mount Hermon and Bashan. 2 Sam. iii. 3. The inhabitants are called Geshurites. Deuter. iii. 14. [IV., VI.]— β . Geshuri, a people in the south of Palestine. Josh. xiii. 2. [IV.]
 GE'THER, a Syrian tribe. Gen. x. 23.
 GETHSEM'ANE, (oil-press), a small field or garden, just out of Jerusalem, at the foot of the Mount of Olives. Matt. xxvi. 36. [VIII.] See p. 41.
 GEZ'ER, a Levitical town in Ephraim. Josh. x. 33. [IV.]
 GEZ'RITES, probably the inhabitants of the city Gezer. 1 Sam. xxvii. 8.
 GI'AH, a place near Gibeon. 2 Sam. ii. 24.
 GIB'BAR, probably the same as Gibeon. Ezra ii. 20.
 GIB'BETHON, a Levitical city in Dan. Josh. xix. 44.
 GIB'EAH, (a hill, and hence used as the name of several towns situated on eminences), a. in Judah. Joshua xv. 57. [IV., V.]— β . in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 28. (Neh. xii. 29, Geba.) [IV., V.]— γ . in Ephraim, where Eleazar, the son of Aaron, was buried. Josh. xxiv. 33. ("In a hill." Auth. Vers.)
 GIB'EON, (pertaining to a hill), a Levitical city in the tribe of Benjamin. Josh. ix. 3. [IV., V., VI.]

- GI'DOM, a city in Benjamin. Judg. xx. 45.
- GI'HON, (valley of grace), a. one of the rivers of Paradise. Gen. ii. 13.—β. a valley and pool near the western walls of Jerusalem. 1 Kings i. 33. [VIII.]
- GI'LBOA, (the wall-fountain), a mountain-ridge to the south of the valley of Jezreel, in Issachar. 1 Sam. xxviii. 4. [III., IV., VI., IX.]
- GI'LEAD, a. a large district east of the Jordan. Gen. xxxvii. 25. [IV., V., VI.]—β. a mountain-range connected with Lebanon by means of Mount Hermon. Gen. xxxi. 21. [III.]—γ. a city south of the river Jabbok; also called Jabesh-Gilead. Judg. xxi. 8.
- GI'GAL, (a heap), a. the place of the first encampment of the Israelites, after the passage of the Jordan. Josh. iv. 19. [IV.]—β. a place near Shechem. Deut. xi. 30. [IV., VI.]
- GI'LOH, a town in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 51.
- GIM'ZO, (bulrush), a town in Judah. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18. [V.]
- GIR'GASHITES, one of the Canaanitish nations on the west of the Jordan, probably a branch of the Hivites. Gen. x. 16.
- GIR'TAH, a town in Samaria, mentioned by Justin Martyr, Eusebius, and other early writers, but not in the Scriptures. [IV., VI.]
- GIR'TAIM, (two wine-presses), a town of the Benjamites. 2 Sam. iv. 3; Neh. xi. 33.
- GIR'TITES, a tribe of Philistines. Josh. xiii. 3.
- GI'ZONITES. 1 Chron. xi. 34.
- GO'ATH, a place near Jerusalem. Jer. xxxi. 39.
- GOB, (cistern), a place where David fought with the Philistines. 2 Sam. xxi. 19.
- GO'LAN, (a passage), a city of refuge in Manasseh. Deut. iv. 43. [IV.]
- GOL'GOTHA, (a heap of skulls), Matt. xxvii. 33, or CALVARY. See p. 40. [VIII.]
- GO'MER, a northern people, descended from a son of Japheth. Gen. x. 2. [I.]
- GOMOR'RAH, (rebellious people), one of "the cities of the plain." Gen. x. 19.
- GO'SHEN, (pasture-land), a. a province of Egypt, on the eastern side of the Nile, now called Sharkieh: it has been always celebrated for its fertility. Genesis xlv. 10. [II., III.]—β. a city with a neighboring district in the tribe of Judah. Josh. x. 41. [V.]
- GO'ZAN, a region of Mesopotamia, subject to the Assyrians. 2 Kings xvii. 6.
- GRE'CIA, GREECE, a celebrated country in the south-east of Europe. Dan. viii. 21. [II., VII.]
- GUD'GODAH, an Israelitish station in the Desert. Deut. x. 7. [III.]
- GUR, (dwelling), a place in the western portion of Manasseh. 2 Kings ix. 27.
- GUR-BA'AL, (dwelling of Baal), a town or district in Arabia. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7.
- HA'BOR, a river of Mesopotamia, elsewhere called Chebar. 2 Kings xvii. 7. [II.]
- HACH'ILAH, a hill near the desert of Ziph. 1 Sam. xxiii. 19.
- HA'DAD-RIM'MON, a town in the plain near Megiddon, afterwards called Maximianopolis. Zech. xii. 11. Both Hadad and Rimmon are the names of Syrian idols. [IV., V.]
- HAD'ASHAH, in Judah. Josh. xv. 37.
- HA'DID, in Benjamin. Neh. vii. 37.
- HADO'RAM, an Arabian tribe. Gen. x. 27. [I., II.]
- HA'DRACH, a city and region east of Damascus. Zech. ix. 1.
- HAG'ARITES, HAGARE'NES, HAG'GERI, an Arabian pastoral tribe. 1 Chron. v. 10. [I., II.]
- HA'LAH, or rather CHA'LACH, a district of Media. 2 Kings xviii. 6. [II.]
- HAL'HUL, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 58. [V.]
- HA'LI, in Asher. Josh. xix. 25. [III.]
- HAM, (heat), a. a poetic name for Egypt.—β. a country inhabited by the Zuzim, but its exact geographical position is unknown. Gen. xiv. 5. [I.]
- HA'MATH, the name of one of the smaller Syrian kingdoms, and of its capital, (on the river Orontes,) which was called Epiphania by the Greeks. Num. xiii. 21. [I., II., V.] (1 Chron. xiii. 5, Hemath.) (2 Chron. viii. 3, Hamath-zobah.) [V.]
- HAM'MATH, a fenced city near the sea of Chinnereth. Josh. xix. 35. [IV.]
- HAM'MON, a. a town in Asher. Josh. xix. 28.—β. a town in Naphtali. 1 Chron. vi. 76.
- HAM'MOTH-DOR, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xxi. 32.
- HA'NES, a city of Egypt. See Tahpanhes. Isa. xxx. 4.
- HAN'NANE'EL, a tower in Jerusalem. Neh. iii. 1.
- HAN'NATHON, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 14.
- HAPHRA'IM, in Issachar. Josh. xix. 19.
- HA'RA, a province of Assyria. 1 Chron. v. 26. [II.]
- HAR'ADAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 24.
- HA'RAN, or CHAR'RAN, a city, on a river of the same name, which falls into the Euphrates, called by the Greeks Charran, and by the Romans Charrae. It is situated in a sandy plain, 30° 40' N. lat., 39° 2' 45" E. long., and is now called Harran. Gen. xi. 31, 32. [II., V.]
- HA'RARITE, (a mountaineer), 2 Sam. xxxiii. 11, 33.
- HA'RETH, a forest in Judah. 1 Sam. xxii. 5.
- HA'ROD, a fountain near Gilboa. Judg. vii. 1.
- HAR'OSHETH, (forest), a town in the north of Palestine. Judg. iv. 2. [IV., VI.]
- HASHMO'NAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 29.
- HAV'RAN, a tract in Syria, south of Damascus, called by the Romans Auranitis. Ezek. xlvii. 16, 18. [II., V.] See p. 32.
- HAV'ILAH, a. a land rich in gold. Gen. ii. 11.—β. a district of Arabia, so called from a son of Cush. Gen. x. 7. [I., II., V.]
- HA'VOth-JA'IR, (Jair's village), Num. xxxiii. 41.
- HA'ZAR-E'NAN, (village of fountains), a town in the north of Canaan. Num. xxxiv. 9.
- HA'ZAR-GAD'DAH, in Judah. Josh. xv. 27.
- HA'ZAR-HAT'TICON, (the middle village), a town on the borders of Hauran. Ezek. xlvii. 16.
- HA'ZAR-MA'VETH, (the enclosure of death), so called from the unhealthiness of the locality, a district in Arabia Felix, abounding in spices. Gen. x. 26. [I.]
- HA'ZAR-SHU'AL, (fox-village), in Judah. Josh. xv. 28.

- HA'ZAR-SU'SAH, and HA'ZAR-SU'SIM, (horse-village), in Simeon. Josh. xix. 5; 1 Chron. iv. 31.
- HAZE'RIM, (villages of the Avims), in Judah. Deut. ii. 23.
- HAZE'ROTH, (enclosures), a station of the Israelites in Arabia Petraea. The modern Arabic name is Hudherah, where there still is a fountain. Num. xi. 35. [III.]
- HAZ'EZON-TA'MAR, (pruning of the palm), a town in the wilderness of Judah, celebrated for its palms, afterward called En-gedi, (kid's fountain), Gen. xiv. 7. [IV.]
- HA'ZOR, a. a town in Benjamin. Neh. xi. 33. [IV.]— β . in Naphtali, fortified by Solomon. Josh. xi. 1. [IV., VI.]— γ . in Judah, the same as Hezron, or Kerioth-hezron. Josh. xv. 3, 23.— δ . a district in Arabia. Jer. xlix. 28.
- HA'ZOR-HADAT'TAH, in Judah. Josh. xv. 25. (In the Auth. Vers. the names are given separately, as of two places, Hazor, Hadattah.)
- HE'BRON, (society, or friendship), a town in Judah, twenty miles south of Jerusalem, anciently called Kirjath-Arba, (city of Arba), from Arba, father of Anak. It was also called Mamre. Gen. xiii. 18. [II., III., IV., V., VI., IX.]
- HE'LAM, a town near the Euphrates. 2 Sam. x. 17.
- HEL'BAH, in Asher. Judg. i. 31. [IV.]
- HEL'BOX, (fatness), the Chalybon of the Greeks and Romans, and the modern Aleppo, or, as the natives call it, Haleb, situated in N. lat. $36^{\circ} 11' 25''$, E. long. $37^{\circ} 9'$. Ezek. xxvii. 18. [II., V.]
- HE'LEPH, in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.
- HELIOP'OLIS. See Bethshemesh, and On. [V., VII.]
- HEL'KATH, a Levitical city in Asher. Josh. xix. 25; xxi. 31.
- HEL'KATH-HAZ'ZURIM, (field of strong men), a place near Gibeon. 2 Sam. ii. 16.
- HE'NA, probably the same as Anah, a city in Mesopotamia, situated on the Euphrates. 2 Kings xviii. 34.
- HE'PHER, a royal city, the same as Gath-hepher. Josh. xii. 17. [V.]
- HE'RES, a mountain near Ekron. Judg. i. 35. [IV.]
- HER'MON, (mountain), a mountain, the south-eastern branch of Anti-Libanus, called by the Sidonians, Sirion, and Shenir by the Amorites. Deut. iii. 8, 9. [III., IV., V., VI., IX.] Another mountain, known as Little Hermon, is not far from Tabor. [IX.]
- HESH'BON, (industry), the metropolis of the Amorites, afterward a Levitical city in Gad. Num. xxi. 26. [II., III., IV., VI.]
- HESH'MON, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 27.
- HETH'LOH, a town near Damascus. Ezek. xlvii. 15.
- HEZ'RON, the western limit of Judah. Josh. xv. 3. The same as Hazor.
- HID'DEKEL, the river Tigris. Gen. ii. 14.
- HIERAP'OLIS, (holy city), a city of Phrygia, not far from Colosse and Laodicea. Col. iv. 13. [II.]
- HI'LEN, in Judah: probably the same as Holon. 1 Chron. vi. 58.
- HIN'NOM, or BEN-HIN'NOM, an unknown person whose name is given to a valley that bounds Jerusalem on the north. Josh. xv. 8. [VIII.]
- HIT'TITES, a Canaanitish nation, descendants of Heth. Gen. x. 15. [III., V.]
- HI'VITES, a Canaanitish nation, resident near Hermon. Gen. xxxiv. 2. [III., V.]
- HO'BAH, a city west of Damascus. Gen. xiv. 15. [III.]
- HO'LOH, a. a Levitical city in Judah. Josh. xv. 51. [V.]— β . a place in Moab, probably the same as Holon. Jer. xlviii. 21.
- HOR, (who shows, or an elevation), a. a mountain in Arabia Petraea, now called Jebel Haroun, (Mount Aaron,) Num. xxi. 4. [II., V., IX.]— β . another mountain in the north of Palestine. Num. xxxiv. 7, 8. [III.]
- HO'REB, (solitude), the northern peak of the mountain-ridge of Sinai. Exod. iii. 1. [II., III., IX.]
- HO'REM, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 38.
- HORHAGID'GAD, (hill of felicity), an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 32.
- HOR'ITES, the people who inhabited Mount Seir before the Edomites. Gen. xiv. 6.
- HOR'MAH, (curse), a royal city in the territory of Simeon, at first called Zephath. Num. xiv. 45. [III., IV., VI.]
- HORONA'IM, HOR'ONITES, a Moabitish city. Isa. xv. 5; Neh. ii. 10.
- HO'SAH, a town in Asher. Josh. xix. 29.
- HUK'KOK, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 34.
- HUL. Gen. x. 23. [II.]
- HUM'TAH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 54.
- IB'LEAM, a town in Manasseh. Josh. xvii. 11 [IV.]
- ICO'NIUM, the capital of Lycaonia, situated at the foot of Mount Taurus, now called Koni-yeh. Acts xiii. 51. [II., VII.]
- ID'ALAH, in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 15.
- IDUME'A. See Edom, and p. 32. Mark iii. 8.
- I'M, in Judah. Josh. xv. 29.
- I'JE-AB'ARIM, an Israelitish station. Num. xxi. 11.
- I'JON, or I'JON-A'BIL, a fortified city in Naphtali. 1 Kings xv. 20. [VI.]
- ILLYR'ICUM, a country north-west of Macedonia, answering nearly to that which is at present called Dalmatia. Rom. xv. 19. [II., VII.]
- IN'DIA, in eastern Asia, not known to the Hebrews till the days of Esther, though probably India, as then understood, may have been only the region forming the modern Cabul and Beloochistan. Esth. i. 1. [I.]
- IR'NAHASH, in Judah. 1 Chron. iv. 12.
- I'RON, a city in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 38.
- IR'PEEL, a city in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 27.
- ISH'MAEITES, Arabs descended from Ishmael, trading with Egypt, and wandering as far as the Persian Gulf and Assyria. Gen. xxxvii. 25. [II.]
- ISH'TOB, a district beyond Jordan. Judg. xi. 3. [II., V.]
- IS'RAEL, (a prince with God), the kingdom of the ten tribes. 2 Kings xiv. 9. See p. 29. [V.]
- IS'SACHAR, a tribal division in Canaan. Num. xxvi. 25. [IV.]

- IT'ALY, a country in Europe, having Rome as its capital. Acts xviii. 2. [VII.]
- ITH'NAN, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 23.
- IT'AH-KA'ZIN, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 13.
- ITURE'A, a district in the north-east of Palestine, forming, in the time of our Saviour, the tetrarchy of Philip. The name is supposed to be derived from Itur, or Jetur, one of Ishmael's sons. 1 Chron. i. 31. The name is retained, slightly altered, in the modern el-Jedur. Luke iii. 1. See p. 32. [VI.]
- IV'AH, the same as Ava. 2 Kings xviii. 34.
- JA'AZAR, or JA'ZER, a Levitical city in Gad. Its ruins are now called Sâr. Num. xxi. 32. [IV., VI.] In Jer. xlviii. 32, a "sea of Jazer" is mentioned, but the correctness of the reading is doubtful. The LXX. reads, the "cities of Jazer."
- JAB'BOK, (the boisterous), the modern Zerka; a stream which runs through the country east of the Jordan, and falls into that river about thirty miles below the Lake of Tiberias. Gen. xxxii. 22. [IV., V., VI., IX.]
- JA'BESH-GIL'EAD, a town belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh, beyond the Jordan, in the land of Gilead. Judg. xxi. 8, 9. The brook Jabesh (or the dry) is near the site of the town. [IV., VI.]
- JA'BEZ, a town in Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 55.
- JAB'NEEL, (building of God), a. a town in Judah, Josh. xv. 11.—β. a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.
- JAB'NEH, a town situated on the coast of the Mediterranean, which was taken from the Philistines by Uzziah. A village now stands on its site, called Yebna. 2 Chron. xxvi. 6.
- JACOB'S WELL, near Shechem, in Samaria; a church was built over this spot by the Empress Helena, of which only the foundations remain. According to a recent measurement, its depth is seventy-five feet, with a diameter of nine feet. It is hewn out of solid rock. John iv. 6. [IV., VI.]
- JA'GUR, in Judah. Josh. xv. 21.
- JA'HAZ, JAH'A'ZA, (quarrel, dispute), or JAH'ZA, a Levitical city in Reuben. Num. xxi. 23. [IV.]
- JANO'HAH, a town in Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 6.
- JA'NUM, a town in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 53.
- JAPHI'A, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 12. [IV., V.]
- JAPH'LETI, a town in Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 3.
- JA'PHO, JOP'PA, (beauty), the Jaffa of modern history, a city of the Philistines, now a seaport of Palestine, forty miles north-west of Jerusalem. Josh. xix. 46. [II., III., IV., V., VI., VII., IX.]
- JAR'MUTH, a. a town in Judah. Josh. x. 3.—β. a Levitical city in Issachar. Josh. xxi. 29. [IV., V., VI.]
- JAT'TIR, a Levitical city in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 48. [IV., VI.]
- JA'VAN, a. Greece, primarily modern Ionia, being nearest and best known to the Orientals. Gen. x. 2: Dan. viii. 21: (Grecia:) Joel iii. 6. (Grecians.)—β. a city in Arabia Felix, probably Javan. Ezek. xxvii. 13, 19. [I., VII.]
- JE'ARIM, a mount in Judah. Josh. xv. 10.
- JE'BUS, (possession), the ancient name of Jerusalem, the inhabitants of which were called Jebusites. Judg. xix. 10. [III., V.]
- JEB'USITES, a powerful Canaanitish nation, who built Jerusalem, and called it Jebus, after the name of their progenitor. Gen. x. 16. [III., IV., V.]
- JEHOSH'APHAT, a valley between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. Joel iii. 2. [VIII.]
- JE'HUD, a town in Dan. Josh. xix. 45. [V.]
- JEKAB'ZEEL, a town in Judah. Neh. xi. 25.
- JE'RAH, an Arabian tribe. Gen. x. 26. [II.]
- JERAHM'EELITES. 1 Sam. xxvii. 10.
- JE'RICHO, (called "the city of palm trees"), in a plain of the same name not far from the Jordan, at the point where it enters the Dead Sea. An inconsiderable village, called Rihah, now stands on its site, six miles west of the Jordan, north lat. 31° 57', and east long. 35° 33'. Num. xxii. 1. [II., IV., V., VI., IX.]
- JE'RUEL, a wilderness in Judah. 2 Chron. xx. 16.
- JERUSALEM, (possession of peace), a royal city of the Canaanites, and from the time of David the metropolis of the Hebrews. See page 36. Josh. x. 1. [II., IV., V., VI., VII., IX., X.]
- JESH'ANAH, a town in Judah. 2 Chron. xiii. 19.
- JESH'UA, a town in Judah. Neh. xi. 26.
- JETH'LAH, a town in Dan. Josh. xix. 42.
- JE'TUR, an Arabian tribe. Gen. xxv. 15.
- JEZ'REEL, (the seed of God), a. a town in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 56: 1 Sam. xxix. 1.—β. a town in the tribe of Issachar, where stood the palace of Ahab and his successors. Josh. xvii. 16. [IV., V.]
- JIPH'TAH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 43.
- JIPH'TAH-EL, a valley in the tribes of Zebulun and Asher. Josh. xix. 14.
- JO'BAB, an Arabian tribe. Gen. x. 29. [I.]
- JOG'BEHAH, a town in Gad. Num. xxxii. 35. [IV.]
- JOK'DEAM, a town in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 56.
- JOK'MEAM, a Levitical city in Ephraim. 1 Chron. vi. 68.
- JOK'NEAM, of Carmel, or "at the foot of Carmel," a Levitical city in Zebulun. Josh. xii. 22. [IV.]
- JOK'TAN, (small), an Arabian people. Gen. x. 25.
- JOK'THEEL, a. the city of Sela or Petra, the capital of Arabia Petræa. 2 Kings xiv. 7.—β. a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 38.
- JOP'PA, (beautiful). See Japho.
- JOR'DAN, (river of judgment), the principal river of Palestine, rising at the foot of Anti-Libanus, and flowing into the Dead Sea. See p. 42. Gen. xxxii. 10. [II., IV., V., VI., IX.]
- JOT'BAH, a city of Judah. 2 Kings xxi. 19.
- JOT'BATHAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 33.
- JU'DAH, (the praise of the Lord), or JUDEA, a. a tribal division of Canaan. Josh. xv. See p. 27. [IV.]—β. the mountains of. Josh. xv. 48. [IV., V., IX.]—γ. the kingdom of. Ps. cxiv. 2. See p. 29. [V.]—δ. the wilderness of. Judg. i. 16. [VI., IX.] See p. 46.
- JUDE'A, (praise), the land of the Jews, Matt. xix. 1. After the captivity, the name Judea was applied to the whole of Palestine west of the - Jordan, (Haggai ii. 2.) Under the Romans, in the time of Christ, Palestine was divided into Judea, Galilee, and Samaria; but as a general denomination, Judea and Palestine were regarded as synonymous. See p. 29. [VI.]

- JUTHAH, a Levitical city in the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 55. [V.]
- KAB'ZEEL, the same as Jekabzeel. Josh. xv. 21.
- KA'DESH, (holy), or KA'DESH-BAR'NEA, (holiness of corn), a town in the desert to the south of Palestine. Gen. xx. 1: Num. xxvii. 14. [II., III., V.]
- KAD'MONITES, a Canaanitish nation living in the north-east of Palestine. Gen. xv. 19.
- KA'NAH. See CANA.
- KAR'KAA, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 3.
- KAR'KOR, a town beyond the Jordan. Judg. viii. 10.
- KAR'TAH, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xxi. 34.
- KAR'TAN, the same as Kirjathaim, a Levitical city in Naphtali. Josh. xxi. 32.
- KAT'TATH, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 15.
- KE'DAR, (blackness), a district in Arabia, inhabited by wandering shepherds, descended from the second son of Ishmael. Gen. xxv. 18: Sol. Song i. 5. [I., II.]
- KED'EMOTH, a Levitical city in Reuben. Deut. ii. 26. [IV.]
- KE'DESH, a, a town in the south of Judah. Josh. xv. 23. [IV., VI.]—β, another town in the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xii. 22.—γ, another town in Issachar. 1 Chron. vi. 72.
- KEHEL'ATHAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 22.
- KEI'LAH, a city in Judah, about twenty miles south-west of Jerusalem. Josh. xv. 44. [IV., V.]
- KE'NATH, a town in Auranitis, near Bostra; also called Nobah. Num. xxxii. 42. [IV., V.]
- KEN'ITES, a tribe of Midianites, dwelling among the Amalekites. Gen. xv. 19. [III.]
- KEN'IZZITES, a Canaanitish nation, whose locality is unknown. Gen. xv. 19.
- KE'RIOTH, or KE'RIOTH-HEZ'RON, a, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 25. [IV.]—β, a city in Moab. Jer. xlviii. 24.
- KE'ZIZ, a valley. Josh. xviii. 21.
- KIR'ROTH-HATTA'AVAH, (graves of lust), Num. xi. 34.
- KIB'ZAIM, a Levitical city in Ephraim. Josh. xxi. 22.
- KIR'RON, or CE'DRON, (obscurity), a stream, with a valley of the same name, flowing between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, and emptying itself into the Dead Sea. 2 Sam. xv. 23: John xviii. 1. [V., VIII.]
- KIR'NAH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 22.
- KIR, (a city), a, a region near the Caspian Sea, 2 Kings xvi. 9.—β, A fortified city on the borders of Moab, called also Kir of Moab, Isa. xv. 1: Kir-hareseth, Isa. xvi. 7: and Kir-heres, Jer. xlviii. 31, 36: a small town on its site is now called Kerak. 2 Kings ii. 35. [II., III., IV., V.]
- KIR'JATH, (city, or town), the same as Kirjath-jearim. Josh. xviii. 28.
- KIR'JATH-A'IM, (the two cities), a, one of the most ancient towns on the east of the Jordan. (Kiria-
- thaim, Gen. xiv. 5.) See also Jer. xlviii. 1, 23.
- β*, a town in the tribe of Naphtali, the same as Kartan. 1 Chron. vi. 76. [IV.]
- KIR'JATH-AR'BA, (the city of four), the ancient name of Hebron, but still used in the time of Nehemiah. Josh. xv. 13.
- KIR'JATH-A'RIM, (city of cities), an abbreviation for Kirjath-jearim.
- KIR'JATH-BA'AL, (city of Baal), the same as Kirjath-jearim. Josh. xv. 60.
- KIR'JATH-HU'ZOTH, (city of streets), a town in Moab. Num. xxii. 39.
- KIR'JATH-JE'ARIM, (city of the forests), originally one of the towns of the Gibeonites, situated in the tribe of Judah. Josh. ix. 17. [IV., V.]
- KIR'JATH-SAN'NA, (city of palms), otherwise KIR'JATH-SE'PIER, (city of the book): also DE'BIR. Josh. xv. 15.
- KISH'ION, or KISHON, a town in the tribe of Issachar. Josh. xix. 20.
- KI'SHON, a river which rises in Mount Tabor, and flows into the Gulf of Ptolemais. Judg. iv. 7. [IV., VI., IX.]
- KITH'LISH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 40.
- KIT'RON, a town in Zebulun. Judg. i. 30.
- KIT'TIM. [II.] See Chittim.
- LA'BAN, in the Desert of Arabia. Deut. i. 1.
- LA'CHISH, a fortified town in the south of Judah, between Adoraim and Azekah. Josh. xv. 39. [IV., V., VI.]
- LAH'MAM, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 40.
- LA'ISH, (a lion), a town in the north of Palestine, called also Dan and Leshem. Judg. xviii. 7. [IV.]
- LA'KUM, in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.
- LAODICE'A, a city on the borders of Phrygia and Lydia, about forty miles east of Ephesus. Col. iv. 13. [II., VII.] See p. 36.
- LASE'A, a city in Crete. Acts xxvii. 8. [II., VII.]
- LA'SHA, a town supposed to be the same as Callirhoe, a place abounding with hot springs, on the east of the Dead Sea. Gen. x. 19.
- LASHA'RON, a Canaanitish city. Josh. xii. 18.
- LEB'ANON, (white mountain), a mountain-range on the borders of Syria and Palestine; the western ridge is called Lebanon, or Libanus, and the eastern Anti-Libanus. See p. 46. [III., IV., V., VI., IX.] Deut. xi. 24.
- LEB'AOTH, a town in Simeon. Josh. xv. 32.
- LEBO'NAH. Judg. xxi. 19. [VI.]
- LE'HABIM, a people of Egyptian origin, probably Lybians. Gen. x. 13. [I.]
- LE'HI, (jaw-bone), or RA'MATH-LE'HI, (elevation of the jaw-bone), a place in the south of Palestine. Judg. xv. 9.
- LE'SHEM, a town called also Laish and Dan. Josh. xix. 47. [III.]
- LETU'SHIM, an Arabian tribe. Gen. xxv. 3.
- LEUM'MIM, an Arabian tribe. Gen. xxv. 3.
- LEB'NAH, a, a station in the wilderness. Num. xxxiii. 20.—β, a royal city of the Canaanites, afterward a Levitical town belonging to the tribe of Judah. Josh. x. 29. [IV., V.]
- LIB'YA, a country west of Egypt, of which Cyrene was its capital. Acts ii. 10. [II.]
- LOD, LUD, or LYD'DA, a town nine miles east of Joppa, in Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 12. [I., IV., V., VI.]

LOD'EBAR, a place near Jordan. 2 Sam. ix. 4.
 LU'BIM, the Libyans, always connected with the Egyptians and Ethiopians. 2 Chron. xii. 3. [I.]
 LU'DIM, a. an African nation. Gen. x. 13. [II.]
 —β. the Lydians. Gen. x. 22. [I., II.]
 LU'HITH, a height in Moab. Isa. xv. 5.
 LUZ, (separation), a. a town in the country of the Hittites. Judg. i. 26. — β. the ancient name of Bethel. Gen. xxviii. 19. [III.]
 LYCAO'NIA, a province of Asia Minor, subject to the Romans when visited by Paul. Acts xiv. 6. [II., VII.]
 LYO'IA, a province in the south-west of Asia Minor. Acts xxvii. 5. [II., VII.]
 LYO'DA, (See Lod.) Acts ix. 32.
 LYO'TA, a province on the west coast of Asia Minor. Ezek. xxx. 5. [VII.]
 LYO'IANs, or LU'DIM. Ezek. xxx. 5. [II.]
 LYS'TRA, one of the chief towns of Lycaonia. Acts xiv. 6, 8. [II., VII.]

MA'ACHAH, MAACH'ATHI, a city and region at the foot of Mount Hermon. Deut. iii. 14. [IV., V.]
 MA'ARATH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 59.
 MACEDO'NIA, (eminent), a large province of ancient Greece, north-west of the Ægean Sea. Acts xvi. 9: in the time of the apostles under Roman government. [II., VII.]
 MACH'BERAH, a town in Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 49; probably the same as Cabbon. Josh. xv. 40.
 MACHPE'LAH, a cave near Hebron, the burial-place of Sarah. Gen. xxiii. 17.
 MADIA. See Media. [I., II.]
 MADMAN'NAH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 31.
 MAD'MEN, a town on the borders of Moab. Jer. xlviii. 2.
 MAD'MENAH, a town near Jerusalem. Isa. x. 31.
 MA'DON, a Canaanitish city. Josh. xi. 1.
 MAG'BISH, doubtful whether the name of a place or of a man. Ezra ii. 30.
 MAG'DALA, (tower), Matt. xv. 39; the probable birth-place of Mary Magdalene, that is, Mary of Magdala, situated on the Lake of Gennesaret, and on the western shore. It was the Migdal-el of Josh. xix. 38. [VI.] The Moslem village, el Mejdek, probably occupies its site.
 MA'GOG, the name of a son of Japheth, and of a great northern nation descended from him; probably the same whom the Greeks call Scythians. Gen. x. 2. [I.]
 MAHANA'IM, (the camps), a place beyond Jordan, afterward the site of a Levitical town belonging to Gad. Gen. xxxii. 2: Josh. xiii. 26. [IV., V., VI.]
 MA'HANEH, (encampment), in the tribe of Judah. Judg. xviii. 12.
 MAHAN'EHDAN. Judg. xviii. 12.
 MA'KAZ, a town probably in Dan. 1 Kings iv. 9.
 MAK'HELOTH, a station in the wilderness. Num. xxxiii. 25.
 MAKKE'DAH, a town in Judah. Josh. x. 10.
 MAM'RE, (rebellious), an oak-grove in the neighborhood of Hebron. Gen. xiii. 18. [V.]
 MANA'HATH, a town in Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 6.
 MANAS'SEH, one of the tribal divisions. Josh. xvii. 7. See p. 26. [IV.]

MA'ON, (habitation), a city in the south of Judah, near to a wilderness of the same name. Josh. xv. 55. [III., IV., V., VI.]
 MA'ONITES, or MEHU'NIMS, an Arabian tribe. Judg. x. 12.
 MA'RAH, (bitter), a well of bitter water. Exod. xv. 23. [III.]
 MAR'ALAH, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 11.
 MARE'SHAH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 44. [IV., V.]
 MAR'OTH, a town in Judah. Micah i. 12.
 MASH, a people on the borders of Mesopotamia. Gen. x. 23. [I., II.]
 MA'SHAL, a town in Asher. 1 Chron. vi. 74.
 MAS'REKAH, a town or district in Edom. Gen. xxxvi. 36.
 MAS'SAH, (temptation), an Israelitish station in the desert. Exod. xvii. 7.
 MAT'TANAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxi. 18.
 MEA'LON. See Elon.
 MEA'RAH, the name of a town, or simply a cave, near Sidon. Josh. xiii. 4.
 ME'DEBA, a town in Reuben. Num. xxi. 30. [IV.]
 ME'DIA, (Madai, Heb.), a country near the Caspian Sea. See p. 18. 2 Kings xvii. 6. [I., II.]
 MEGID'DO, (host), in the tribe of Issachar, at the foot of Mount Carmel, called by the Romans Legio; by the Greeks, Mageddon, and hence the name Armageddon, or "Mountain of Megiddo," as applied to Carmel. Josh. xii. 21. [IV.]
 MEHO'LAH. See Abel-Meholah. 1 Sam. xviii. 19.
 MEJAR'KON, a town in Dan. Josh. xix. 46.
 MEKO'NAH, in Judah. Neh. xi. 28.
 MELI'TA, the island of Malta. Acts xxviii. 1 [II., VII.]
 MEM'PHIS, (Moph and Noph, Heb.), the ancient capital of Lower Egypt. Hos. ix. 6. [II., III.] Some remains of it are still found on the western bank of the Nile, to the south of old Cairo: in its neighborhood are the pyramids, those mighty monuments of ancient Egypt.
 MEPH'AATH, a Levitical city in Reuben. Josh. xiii. 18.
 MERATHA'IM, probably Babylonia is meant. Jer. i. 21.
 MER'IBAH, (strife), a. a fountain which gushed forth from a rock in Horeb, when struck at the Divine command, by the rod of Moses. Exod. xvii. 7. — β. another fountain produced in the same supernatural manner, in the desert of Zin, near Kadesh. Num. xx. 13, 24.
 ME'ROM, the Lake Samochonitis, now called Huleh, the highest lake of the Jordan. Josh. xi. 5. [IV., V., VI., IX.]
 ME'ROZ, a place in the north of Palestine: the exact site is unknown. Judg. v. 23.
 ME'SHA, in Arabia, supposed to be the modern Mecca. Gen. x. 30.
 ME'SHECH, (shut up, surrounded), a people inhabiting the Moschean mountains, between the Black and the Caspian Seas. Gen. x. 2.
 MES'OBAITE, 1 Chron. xi. 47.
 MESOPOTA'MIA, (the land between the two rivers). Gen. xxiv. 10. See Aram-Naharaim, pp. 10, 15. [I., II., VII.]

ME'THEG-AM'MAH, probably a town of the Philistines. 2 Sam. viii. 1.

MICH'MASH, (gathering), a town of Benjamin, situated in a narrow pass. 1 Sam. xiii. 2. [IV., V.]

MICH'METHAH, a town in Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 6.

MID'DIN, a place in the wilderness of Judah. Josh. xv. 61.

MID'IAN, MID'IANITES, an Arabian nation, descended from Abraham, whose territory extended from the eastern shore of the Elanitic Gulf as far as the land of Moab, and even to Sinai. Gen. xxv. 2. [I., II., IV.]

MIG'DAL-E'DAR, (tower of the flock, or tower of Edar), a village near Bethlehem, Gen. xxxv. 21, used for Bethlehem itself, and figuratively for the royal stock of David. Micah iv. 8.

MIG'DAL-EL, (tower of God), a fortified city in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 38. The same as Magdala. Matt. xv. 39. [IV.]

MIG'DAL-GAD, (tower of Gad), a town in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 37.

MIG'DOL, (the tower), probably the last town on the Egyptian frontier in the direction of the Red Sea; Exod. xiv. 2: Ezek. xxx. 6; ("from the tower of Syene," Auth. Vers., but probably it should be translated "from Migdol to Syene.") [III.]

MIG'RON, a town in Benjamin. 1 Sam. xiv. 2.

MILE'TRUS, a city and seaport of Ionia in Asia Minor, thirty-six miles south of Ephesus. Acts xx. 14. [II., VII.]

MIL'LO, (a wall), a part of the citadel of Jerusalem. 2 Sam. v. 9. [VIII.]— β . a castle of the Shechemites. Judg. ix. 6.

MIN'NI, probably a province of Armenia. Jer. li. 27. [II.]

MIN'NITH, a town on the borders of the Ammonites, Judg. xi. 33, whence wheat was brought to the Tyrian market. Ezek. xxvii. 17.

MIS'GAB, probably a town in Moab. Jer. xlviii. 1.

MI'SHEAL, MI'SHAL, or MA'SHAL, a Levitical city in Asher. Josh. xix. 26. [IV.]

MIS'REPHOTH-MA'IM, (the flow of waters), a town or region near Sidon. Josh. xi. 8.

MITH'GAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 28.

MITH'NIRE, the name of an unknown tribe: occurs only in 1 Chron. xi. 43.

MITYLE'NE, the capital of Lesbos, an island in the Ægean Sea. Acts xx. 15. [II., VII.]

MI'ZAB, a mountain on the eastern ridge of Lebanon. Psal. xlii. 6.

MIZ'PEH, or MIZ'PAH, (watch-tower), a town of the Benjamites. Josh. xviii. 26. [IV., V., VI.]— β . a town in Gilead. Judg. x. 17. [IV., VI.]— γ . a town in the plain country of Judah. Josh. xv. 38.— δ . another in Gad, the same as Ramoth-Mizpeh, or Ramoth-Gilead. Judg. xi. 29.— ϵ . a town in Moab. 1 Sam. xxii. 3.— ζ . a valley in Lebanon. Josh. xi. 8, 8.

MIZ'RAIM. See Egypt. [I., II.]

MO'AB, MO'ABITES, a country and people on the east side of the Jordan. Gen. xix. 37. [II., III., IV., V., VI., IX.]

MOI'ADAH, a town in Simeon. Josh. xv. 26. [IV.]

MOPE. See Memphis.

MO'REH, α . an oak-grove ("plain," Auth. Vers.) near Shechem. Gen. xii. 6.— β . a hill near Jezreel. Judg. vii. 1.

MOR'ESHETH-GATH, a town in Judah. Micah i. 14.

MORI'AH, (vision), one of the hills at Jerusalem, on which the temple was built. Gen. xxii. 2: 2 Chron. iii. 1. [VIII.]

MOSE'ROTH, MOSE'RA, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 30. [III.]

MO'ZAH, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 26.

MY'RA, a city of Lycia. Acts xxvii. 5. [II., VII.]

MYS'IA, the north-western province of Asia Minor, separated from Europe by the Propontis and Hellespont. Acts xvi. 7. [II., VII.]

NA'AMAH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 41. (Job ii. 11, Naamathite.)

NA'ARAN, a town in Ephraim, the same as Naarath. 1 Chron. vii. 28.

NA'ARATH, a town in Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 7.

NAHA'LIEL, an Israelitish station. Num. xxi. 19.

NAHAL'LAL, or NA'HALOL, a Levitical city in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 15. [IV.]

NA'HOR, a city in Mesopotamia. Gen. xxiv. 10.

NA'IN, (pleasantness), a town in Palestine, three miles from Mount Tabor; a hamlet on its site is now called Nein. Luke vii. 11. [VI.]

NA'IOTH, a place near Ramah. 1 Sam. xix. 18.

NAPH'ISH, an Ishmaelitish tribe. Gen. xxv. 15.

NAPH'TALI, α . one of the tribal divisions of Canaan. Josh. xix. 32. See p. 27. [IV.]— β . a mountain in Galilee. Josh. xx. 7.

NAPH'THIM, an Egyptian people. Gen. x. 13.

NAZ'ARETH, (separated, sanctified), a town in Galilee, six miles west-north-west from Mount Tabor, on the western side of a valley. It is now a small but well-built place, containing about 3000 inhabitants, of whom two-thirds are Christians. Matt. ii. 23. [VI., IX.]

NE'AH, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 13.

NEAP'OLIS, (new city), a maritime city in Macedonia, near the borders of Thrace, now called Napoli. Acts xvi. 11. [I., II., VII.]

NEBA'IOTH, (prophecies, or fruits), the name of Ishmael's first-born and of his posterity, who formed one of the Arabian tribes. Isa. lx. 7. (Nebajoth, Gen. xxv. 13.) [I., II., V.]

NEBAL'LAT, a town in Benjamin. Neh. xi. 34. [V.]

NE'BO, (that fructifies), α . a mountain on the confines of Moab. Num. xxxiii. 47. [IV.]— β . a town in the vicinity of Mount Nebo. Num. xxxii. 3.— γ . a town in Judah. Ezra ii. 29.

NE'IEL, a town in Asher. Josh. xix. 27.

NE'KEB, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.

NEPH'TOAH, a fountain in the tribe of Judah, near the valley of Jerusalem, called Ben-Hinnom. Josh. xv. 9.

NETO'PHAH, a town in Judah. 2 Sam. xxiii. 28.

NE'ZIB, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 43. [V.]

NIB'SHAN, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 62.

NICOP'OLIS, (city of victory), a city in Epirus, now called Nicopi. Titus iii. 12. [II., VII.]

NILE, the chief river of Egypt, called in Scripture, by way of eminence, "the river." Gen. xli. [II.]

1185

- NIM'RAH, NIM'RIM, (leopard,) a town in Gad. Num. xxxii. 8.
- NIN'EVEH, the capital of the Assyrian empire, on the Tigris. Gen. x. 11. [I., II.]
- NO, NO-AM'MON, (the seat of Ammon,) Thebes, the capital of Thebais, in Upper Egypt. Jer. xlv. 25. [II.]
- NOB, a Levitical city in Benjamin. 1 Sam. xxi. 1.
- NO'BAH, a town in Manasseh. Judg. viii. 11.
- NOD, (flight,) the country to which Cain fled after the murder of Abel. Gen. iv. 16.
- NO'DAB, an Ishmaelitic tribe. 1 Chron. v. 19.
- NOPH. See Memphis. [II., III.]
- NO'PHAH, a place on the east of the Jordan. Num. xxi. 30.
- O'BAL, an Arabian tribe. Gen. x. 28. (1 Chron. i. 22, Ebal.)
- O'BOTH, an Israelitic station. Num. xxi. 10.
- O'IVER, or MOUNT OF OLIVES, a mountain lying on the east of Jerusalem, from which it is separated by the valley of Jehoshaphat: it is now called by the Arabs, Jebel-et-Tur. 2 Sam. xv. 30: Matt. xxi. 1. [IV., V., VIII., IX.]
- ON, (the sun), or HELIOPOLIS, (the city of the sun), the chief seat of the worshippers of the sun in Egypt, called by the Hebrews Bethshemesh: it lies on the Nile. Gen. xli. 45. (Ezek. xxx. 17, Aven.) [I.]
- O'NO, a town in Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 12.
- O'PHEL, (tower), a place or quarter of Jerusalem, near the walls on the east side. 2 Chron. xxvii. 3. [VIII.]
- O'PHIR, a seaport in southern Arabia: its exact situation is unknown. Gen. x. 29. [I., II.]
- OPH'NI, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 24.
- OPH'RAH, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 23. (Micah i. 10, Aphrah.)—β. a town in Manasseh. Judg. vi. 11. [IV., V., VI.]
- O'REB, a rock near the Jordan. Judg. vii. 25.
- PA'DAN-A'RAM, (plain of Aram, or Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxi. 18; xlviii. 7. "Padan," Hos. xii. 12, "country (or field) of Aram." ("Syria," Auth. Vers.) [II.]
- PAL'ESTINE. See Philistines; and p. 29.
- PAMPHYL'IA, (all tribes), a province of Asia Minor, nearly opposite to the island of Cyprus: the sea between is called the Sea of Pamphylia. Acts ii. 10. [II., VII.]
- PA'PHOS, a city on the western side of Cyprus, and the residence of the Roman governor. Acts xiii. 6. [II., VII.]
- PA'RAH, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 23.
- PA'RAM, the desert region extending from the borders of Judah to the confines of Sinai. Gen. xiv. 6, ("El-Paran," Auth. Vers.;) xxi. 21. [III., V., IX.]
- PA'RAS. See Persia.
- PAR'THIANS, the inhabitants of Parthia. See p. 18. Acts ii. 9. [II.]
- PARVA'IM, a gold region, supposed by Bochart to be the same as Ophir. 2 Chron. iii. 6.
- PAS-DAM'MIM, a town in Judah. 1 Chron. xi. 13. Otherwise called Ephes-dammim.
- PAT'ARA, a port of Lycia, in Asia Minor. Acts xxi. 1. [II., VII.]
- PATH'ROS, a name given to Upper Egypt, Isa. xi. 11: the inhabitants are called Pathrusim. Gen. x. 14. [I., II.]
- PAT'MOS, an island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Sporades. Rev. i. 9. [II., VII.]
- PAU, a city in Edom. Gen. xxxvi. 39. (1 Chron. i. 50, "Pai.")
- PE'KOD, probably a part of Babylonia. Jer. i. 21.
- PEL'ONITE. 1 Chron. xi. 27, 36.
- PEN'IEL, or PENU'EL, (vision of God), a place beyond Jordan, in Gad. Gen. xxxii. 30, 31: Judg. viii. 8, 17. [III.]
- PE'OR, a mountain in Moab. Num. xxiii. 28.
- PER'AZIM, a hill in Judah. Isa. xxviii. 21.
- PE'REZ-UZ'ZAH, (the division of Uzah), 2 Sam. vi. 8.
- PER'GA, a city of Pamphylia, on the river Cestrus. Acts xiii. 13. [II., VII.]
- PER'GAMOS, a town of Great Mysia, now called Bergamo. Rev. i. 11. [II., VII.] See p. 35.
- PER'IZZITES, (villagers), a Canaanitic nation, dwelling on the mountains of Judah. Gen. xiii. 7. [III.]
- PER'SIA, ("Paras," Heb.), a country in Asia. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 20. See p. 18. [I., II.]
- PE'THOR, a town near the Euphrates. Num. xxii. 5.
- PHAR'PAR, a river of Damascus. 2 Kings v. 12. [IV., VI.]
- PHEN'ICE, PHENIC'IA, a narrow tract of country on the Mediterranean coast between Galilee and Syria. Acts xi. 19. [II., VI., VII.]
- PHEN'ICE, a seaport on the western side of Crete. Acts xxvii. 12. [II., VII.]
- PHILADEL'PHIA, (love of a brother), a city of Lydia, the site of one of the seven Apocalyptic churches. Rev. i. 11. [II., VII.]
- PHILIP'PI, a city of proconsular Macedonia, within the limits of ancient Thrace, called "a colony," Acts xvi. 12, because many of Antony's followers were colonized there by Augustus. Acts xx. 6: Phil. i. 1. [II., VII.]
- PHIL'ISTINES, (those that dwell in villages), a tribe which gave its name to the country known as Palestine. Gen. x. 14. See p. 25. [II., III., IV., V.]
- PHRIG'IA, (barren), an inland province of Asia Minor. Acts ii. 10. [II., VII.]
- PHUT, (the bow), an African nation. Gen. x. 6: Jer. xlv. 9: ("Libyans," Auth. Vers.) Ezek. xxxviii. 5: ("Libya," Auth. Vers.) Nahum iii. 9, ("Put," Auth. Vers.) [I.]
- PIB'ESETH, or PUBAS'TUM, the same as Bubastis, a city of Egypt. Ezek. xxx. 17.
- PI-HAH'ROTH, (the pass of Hiroth), a town near the Gulf of Suez. Exod. xiv. 2, 9. [II., III.]
- PIR'ATHON, a town in Ephraim. Judg. xii. 15.
- PIS'GAH, (the eminence), a mountain-ridge in Moab. Num. xxi. 20: Deut. iii. 17. ("Ashdod-Pisgah," that is, Springs of Pisgah, Auth. Vers.) [IV., VI.]
- PISID'IA, a district of Asia Minor, lying mostly on Mount Taurus. Acts xiii. 14. [II., VII.]
- PR'SON, one of the rivers of Paradise. Gen. ii. 11.
- PR'THOM, (the fortress), a treasure-city of Lower Egypt, on the Nile. Exod. i. 11.
- PON'TUS, the north-eastern province of Asia.

- Minor, which took its name from the Pontus Euxinus, (Euxine Sea.) Acts xviii. 2. [II. VII.]
- PTOLEMA'IS. Acts xxi. 7. See Accho.
- PUL, probably an African tribe. Isa. lxxvi. 19.
- PU'NON, a station of the Israelites, near the mountains of Edom. Num. xxxiii. 42. [III.]
- PUT, See Phut.
- PUTE'OLI, (little wells), a maritime town of Campania in Italy: its modern name is Puzzuoli. Acts xxviii. 13. [II., VII.]
- RA'AMAH, a city of the Cushites. Gen. x. 7. [I., II.]
- RAB'DAH, (contentious), a. a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 60.—β. a town in Moab. See Ar.—γ. the same as Rabbath-Ammon. Deut. iii. 11. [II., IV., V., VI.]
- RAB'BITH, a town in Issachar. Josh. xix. 20.
- RA'CHAL, a town in Judah. 1 Sam. xxx. 29.
- RA'HAB, (a public place), a poetical name for Egypt. Ps. lxxxvii. 4. [II., III.]
- RAK'KATH, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 35.
- RAK'KATH, a town in Dan. Josh. xix. 46.
- RA'MAH, (elevated), a. a town of the Benjamites, in the vicinity of Gibeah, afterward known as Ramleh. Josh. xviii. 25. [IV., V.]—β. a town in Naphtali or Asher. Josh. xix. 29, 36.—γ. a town in Gilead. See Ramoth-Gilead.
- RAMATHA'IM-ZO'PHIM, a place in Mount Ephraim. 1 Sam. i. 1. [V.]
- RAME'SES, or RAAM'SES, the name of a province and of a city in the land of Goshen. Gen. xlvii. 11. [II., III.]
- RA'MOTH, (high place), a Levitical town in the tribe of Issachar. 1 Chron. vi. 73. [II.]
- RA'MOTH-GIL'EAD, the same as Mizpeh, a city of refuge in Gad. Deut. iv. 43. [III., IV., V., VI.]
- RA'MOTH-NE'GEB, (Ramoth of the south), Josh. xix. 8.
- RE'CHABITES, a tribe or family of the Kenites. 1 Chron. ii. 55.
- RE'CHAH. 1 Chron. iv. 12.
- RED SEA, originally called the Sea of Edom, which the Romans translated into Mare Rubrum, or Red Sea: it is divided into two arms; the western is called in the Hebrew "the Sea of Bulrushes:" it is now known as the Gulf of Suez; the eastern is called the Elanitic Gulf, or the Gulf of Akabah. Exod. x. 19. See p. 20. [II., III.]
- RE'HOB, a Levitical city in Asher. Num. xiii. 21. [IV., V.]
- REHOBOTH, (room), a. a well dug by Isaac. Gen. xxvi. 22. [IV., VI.]—β. Rehoboth by the river, that is, the Euphrates. Gen. xxxvi. 37.—γ. Rehoboth-Ir, a town of ancient Assyria. Gen. x. 11. [II.]
- RE'KEM, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 27.
- RE'NETHI, a Levitical city in Issachar. Josh. xix. 21. [IV.]
- REPH'AIM, (giants), a. an ancient people of unusual stature, beyond the Jordan. Gen. xiv. 5: Deut. iii. 11. ("Giants," Auth. Vers.)—β. a valley adjacent to the valley of Hinnom, called the "Valley of Giants." Josh. xv. 8. [III.]
- REPH'IDIM, (places of rest), an Israelitish station. Exod. xvii. 1. [III.]
- RE'SEN, an Assyrian city between Nineveh and Calah. Gen. x. 12. [II.]
- REU'BEN, a tribal division of Canaan. See p. 26. Num. xxxii. 29–33. [IV.]
- RE'ZEPH, a city subdued by the Assyrians. 2 Kings xix. 12. [II., V.]
- RHE'GIUM, (a rent), a city in the south-west of Italy, opposite Messina in Sicily, and now called Reggio. Acts xxviii. 13. [II., VII.]
- RHOD'ANIM, the same as Dodanim.
- RHODES, an island near the coast of Asia Minor. Acts xxi. 1. [II., VII.]
- RIB'LAH, a town on the northern border of Palestine. Num. xxxiv. 11. [V.]
- RIM'MON, a. a town in the tribe of Simeon. Josh. xv. 32. [IV., V.]—β. a town on a high conical rock north-east of Gibeah, near the desert. Judg. xx. 45, 47.—γ. REM'MON-METHO'AR, a Levitical city in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 13.—δ. RIM'MON-PA'REZ, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 19.
- RI'PHATH, a northern people, descended from Gomer. Gen. x. 3. [I.]
- RIS'SAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 21.
- RITH'MAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 18. [III.]
- RIVER OF EGYPT, a stream anciently called Rhinocura, and now Wady-el-Arish: it formed the south-western boundary of Canaan. The stream is now dried up. Num. xxxiv. 5. [II., III., IX.] Some think it means the Nile, as "the stream of Egypt," Isa. xxvii. 12, "the flood of Egypt," Amos viii. 8, which means the Nile.
- RO'GEL, or EN-RO'GEL, (fuller's fountain), a fountain in Judah. Josh. xv. 7.
- ROGE'LIM, a place in Gilead. 2 Sam. xvii. 27. Probably the same spot as Rogel.
- ROME, a celebrated city on the Tiber, the capital of Italy. Acts ii. 10. [II., VII.]
- RU'MAH, a town. 2 Kings xxiii. 36. Perhaps the same as Arumah. Judg. ix. 41.
- SABE'ANS, a name of Arabians. Job i. 15.
- SAB'TAH, an Arabian tribe. Gen. x. 7.
- SAB'TECHAH, an ancient district in Africa. Gen. x. 7. [I., II.]
- SAL'AMIS, a maritime city of Cyprus, on the south-east coast. Acts xiii. 5. [II., VII.]
- SAL'CHAH, or SAL'CAH, a city of Bashan. Deut. iii. 10. [V.]
- SA'LEM, (peace), a. an ancient name for Jerusalem. Gen. xiv. 18. [III.]—β. a town near to Shechem. [IV., VI.]
- SALMO'NE, a promontory on the eastern extremity of the island of Crete. Acts xxvii. 7. [II., VII.]
- SALT, CITY OF, a town in the desert of Judah, near the Dead Sea. Josh. xv. 62.
- SALT SEA, or DEAD SEA, called also "the Sea of the Plain," Deut. iv. 49, and "the East Sea." Joel ii. 20. See p. 44. [II., IV., V., VI., IX.]
- SALT, VALLEY OF, near the Dead Sea. 2 Sam. viii. 13. [IV.]
- SAMA'RIA, a city near the middle of Palestine,

- built by Omri, king of Israel, on a hill called by the same name, from its former owner, Shemer, which was also applied to the surrounding district. 1 Kings xiii. 32; xvi. 24. See p. 30. [VI.]
- SA'MOS, (full of sand), an island in the Ægean Sea. Acts xx. 15. [II., VII.]
- SAMOTHRACIA, an island in the north-east part of the Ægean Sea, now called Samandraci. Acts xvi. 11. [II., VII.]
- SANSAN'NAH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 31.
- SAPH'IR, a town in Judea. Micah i. 11.
- SAR'DIS, the capital of Lydia. Rev. i. 11. See p. 35. [II., VII.]
- SAREP'TA, the same as Zarephath, a Phœnician town near Tyre. Luke iv. 26. [VI.]
- SA'RID, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xix. 10.
- SE'BA, an African tribe. Gen. x. 7. [I., II.]
- SEC'ACAH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 61.
- SE'CHU, a village near Ramah. 1 Sam. xix. 22.
- SE'TR, a. the mountainous country of the Edomites, reaching from the Dead Sea to the Elanitic Gulf. Gen. xiv. 6. [III., IX.]—β. a mountain in Judah. Josh. xv. 10.
- SE'IRATH, a place in Ephraim. Judg. iii. 26.
- SE'LAH, or SE'LA, ("rock," the same as Petra, the capital of Arabia Petrea. Judg. i. 36. [V.]
- SE'LA-HAMMAHLE'KOTH, (the rock of divisions), in the wilderness, west of the Dead Sea. 1 Sam. xxiii. 28.
- SELEU'CIA, a city of Syria, near the mouth of the Orontes. Acts xii. 4. [I., II., VII.]
- SEN'AAH, a town in Judah. Ezra ii. 35.
- SE'NEH, a sharp rock in the pass Michmash. 1 Sam. xiv. 4.
- SE'NIR, or SHE'NIR, (coat of mail), the Amorite name for Mount Hermon. Deut. iii. 9.
- SE'PHAR, a port in Arabia. Gen. x. 30. [I., II.]
- SEPE'ARAD, a place in Lydia, Asia Minor. Obad. 20.
- SEPHARVA'IM, (the two scribes), a town subject to the Assyrians; supposed to be the present Sippbara, on the Euphrates. 2 Kings xvii. 24. [II.]
- SHAALAB'BIN, the same as Shaalbim, a town in Dan. Josh. xix. 42.
- SHAAL'BIM, a town of the Amorites, in the tribe of Dan. Judg. i. 35. [IV.]
- SHAHAZ'IMAH, or SHAHAZ'IM, a town in Issachar. Josh. xix. 22.
- SHA'LIM, 1 Sam. ix. 4; perhaps the same as the preceding.
- SHAL'ISHA, or SAL'ISA, the same as Baal-Shalisha. 1 Sam. ix. 4. [IV., VI.]
- SHA'MIR, a. a town in Mount Ephraim. Judg. x. 1. [IV.]—β. a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 48.
- SHA'PHER, a mountain in the desert. Num. xxxiii. 23.
- SHAR'AIM, SHAARA'IM, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 36; 1 Sam. xvii. 52.
- SHAR'ON, (his plain), a level tract between Mount Carmel and Cæsarea, celebrated for its rich pastures. (Josh. xii. 18, Lasharon.) A town of the same name was on its eastern border. [IV., VI., IX.] (Acts ix. 35, Saron.)
- SHARU'HREN, a town in Simeon. Josh. xix. 6.
- SHA'YER, (the king's dale), a valley on the north of Jerusalem. Gen. xiv. 17.
- SHE'BA, SARE'ANS, a. the descendants of Sheba, son of Joktan. Gen. x. 28. [I., II.]—β. a town in Simeon. Josh. xix. 2.
- SHE'BAM, a town in Reuben. Num. xxxii. 3.
- SHE'CHEM, or SI'CHEM, called also SY'CHAR, a Levitical city of refuge in Ephraim, about forty miles from Jerusalem, situate in a narrow plain between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim: near it was Jacob's well. John iv. 6: Gen. xii. 6. [II., III., IV., V., VI., IX.]
- SHE'LEPH, an Arabian tribe. Gen. x. 26.
- SHE'MA, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 26.
- SHEN, (a tooth), a rock. 1 Sam. vii. 12.
- SHE'PHAM, a place in Judah, Num. xxxiv. 10; perhaps the same as Siphmoth. 1 Sam. xxx. 28.
- SHE'SHACH, a name of Babylon: its origin and signification are doubtful. Jer. xxv. 26.
- SHIB'ARIM, a town in Judah. Josh. vii. 5.
- SHIB'MAH, a town in Reuben. Num. xxxii. 38.
- SHI'RON, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 11.
- SHI'HOR-LIB'NATH, (glass river), a stream on the borders of Asher. Josh. xix. 26.
- SHIL'HIM, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 32.
- SHI'LOH, (rest), a city in the tribe of Ephraim. Josh. xviii. 1. [IV., V., VI.]
- SHIM'RON, SHIM'RON-ME'RON, a town in Zebulun. Josh. xi. 1. [IV.]
- SHI'NAR, an ancient name of Babylonia. Gen. x. 10. [III.]
- SHIT'TIM, (accacias), a. the last station of the Israelites before they passed the Jordan. Num. xxv. 1; xxxiii. 49, ("Abel-Shittim," Auth. Vers., "plains of Shittim," Marg. R.)—β. a valley west of the Jordan, and probably near Jerusalem. Joel iii. 18.
- SHO'PHAN, a town in Gad. Num. xxxii. 35.
- SHU'AL, a district in Benjamin. 1 Sam. xiii. 17.
- SHU'NEM, a town in Issachar. Josh. xix. 18. [IV.]
- SHUR, (a well), a. a city on the borders of Egypt toward Palestine, supposed to have been in the vicinity of the modern Suez. Gen. xvi. 7.—β. a desert extending from the city to the borders of Palestine. Exod. xv. 22; called in Num. xxxiii. 8, "the wilderness of Etham."
- SHU'SHAN, or SU'SA, (the lily), a. a Persian city. Neh. i. 1.—β. a winter palace of the Persian kings, on the river Choaspes. Dan. viii. 2. [I., II.]
- SIB'RAIM, a city near Damascus. Ezek. xlvii. 16.
- SID'DIM, the plain of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, which at their destruction became the Dead Sea, (or a portion of it.) Gen. xiv. 3, 8, 10.
- SI'DON. See Zidon.
- SI'HOR, (black), a. the Hebrew name for the Nile. Isa. xxiii. 3.—β. the river of Egypt, on the Rhinocura. Josh. xiii. 3. [III.] But see "River of Egypt."
- SIL'LA, a place near Jerusalem. 2 Kings xii. 20.
- SIL'OAH, or SIL'OAM, a fountain and pool at the entrance of the valley of Tyropæon, near Mount Zion. Neh. iii. 15. [IX.]
- SIM'BON, a tribal division of Canaan. See p. 28. Josh. xix. 1-9.

- SIN, (slime), a. a fortified city at the mouth of the eastern arm of the Nile, in Egypt, generally supposed to be the Pelusium of the Greeks. Ezek. xxx. 15. [III.]—β. the desert which the Israelites entered on leaving the Red Sea. Exod. xvi. 1. [II.]
- SINAI, a mountainous district in Arabia Petrea, and, in a stricter sense, a ridge three miles in length, the northern end of which is termed Horeb, and the southern, Sinai, now known as Jebel Musa, or the Mount of Moses. Exod. xvi. 1. [II., III., IX.]
- SINIM, probably China, though some suppose Persia is meant. Isa. xlix. 12. [I.]
- SINITES, a northern Canaanitish people. Gen. x. 17.
- SIRON, a name for Mount Hermon. Deut. iv. 48. Also Zion, which see.
- SIPH'MOTH, a town in Judah. 1 Sam. xxx. 28.
- SIR'ION, the Sidonian name for Mount Hermon. Deut. iii. 9.
- SIT'NAH, (hatred), one of Isaac's wells. Gen. xxvi. 21.
- SMYR'NA, a celebrated commercial city of Ionia, and still flourishing: the Turks call it Izmir. Rev. i. 11. See p. 35. [II., VII.]
- SO'COH, SHO'CHON, or SO'CHO, a. a town in Judah, in the vale of Elah. Josh. xv. 35.—β. a town near the mountains of Judah. Josh. xv. 48; now called Shuweikeh. [IV., V.]
- SON'OM, one of the cities in the vale of Siddim, having its own chief or king. Gen. x. 19.
- SO'REK, (a vine), a valley so called, near to Gath. Judg. xvi. 4. [IV., VI.]
- SPAIN, a Roman province, formerly including both Spain and Portugal. Rom. xv. 24.
- SUC'COth, (booths), a. a place east of Jordan, between that river and the brook Jabbok, about forty miles from Jerusalem. Gen. xxxiii. 17. [IV., VI.]—β. the first station of the Israelites after Rameses. Exod. xii. 37.
- SUK'KIMS, (dwellers in tents), an African nation. 2 Chron. xii. 3.
- SZ'OHAR. See Shechem. John iv. 5.
- SYE'NE, (key or border fortress), a city of Egypt, in the Thebais, or southern extremity of the country, toward Ethiopia. Ezek. xxix. 10. [I., II.]
- SYE'ACUSE, a city of antiquity, on the southeast coast of Sicily. Acts xxviii. 12. [II., IX.]
- SYR'IA, (sublime), the region from west to east, between the Mediterranean and the Euphrates, and from north to south, between the Lebanon and the borders of the desert. See p. 15. Gen. xxviii. 5. [II., VI., IX.]
- TA'ANACH, or TA'NACH, a Levitical city in Manasseh. Josh. xvii. 11. [IV.]
- TA'ANATH-SHIF'LOH, a town on the border of the tribe of Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 6.
- TAB'BATH, a town in Issachar. Judg. vii. 22.
- TAB'ERAH, (a burning), an Israelitish station in the wilderness. Num. xi. 3. [III.]
- TA'BOB, a. a mountain on the confines of Zebulun and Naphtali. Josh. xix. 22. [III., IV., VI., IX.]—β. an oak-grove, ("plain," Auth. Vers.) in the vicinity of Benjamin. 1 Sam. x. 3.—γ. a Levitical city, situated on Mount Tabor. 1 Chron. vi. 77.
- TAD'MOR, or TA'MAR, (palm tree), a city built by King Solomon, the Palmyra of heathen writers, situated between the Euphrates and Hamath, in a fertile tract of the desert. 1 Kings ix. 18. [II., V., VII.]
- TAHAP'ANES, TAHPAN'HEES, or TEHAPH'NEHES, (the cape of the land), or, abbreviated, HA'NES Isa. xxx. 4, the same as Daphne, a fortified city on the Nile, near Pelusium in Egypt. Jer. ii. 16. [III.]
- TA'HATH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 26.
- TAH'TIM-HOB'SHI, a district, uncertain in what place. 2 Sam. xxiv. 6.
- TA'MAR, (palm tree), a town on the south border of Palestine. Ezek. xlvii. 19. See Tadmor. [IV., V.]
- TAP'PUAH, a. a town in Ephraim or Manasseh. Josh. xvi. 8.—β. a town in Judah. Josh. xii. 17. [IV.]
- TA'RAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 27.
- TAR'ALAH, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 27.
- TAR'PELITES, a people of Assyria, sent by the Persians to colonize Samaria. Ezra iv. 9.
- TAR'SHISH, a large town and seat of learning, probably Tarsus in Cilicia; but some think, Tartessus in Spain. Gen. x. 4. [I., II., VII.]
- TAR'SUS, the metropolis of Cilicia, now a poor, decayed town. Acts ix. 11. [I., II., VII.]
- TEKO'AH, (a trumpet), a city six miles south of Bethlehem, in the tribe of Judah. 2 Sam. xiv. 2. It gave its name to an adjacent desert. 2 Chron. xx. 20. [IV., V., VI.]
- TEL-A'BIB, (heap of corn), a town, or plain, in Mesopotamia. Ezek. iii. 15.
- TELA'IM, a town in Judah. 1 Sam. xv. 4.
- TELAS'AR, or THELAS'AR, the site is unknown, but is perhaps the same as Ellasar, or, according to Dr. Layard, Tel-afer in Assyria. 2 Kings xix. 12.
- TE'LEM, or TEL'AIM, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 24.
- TEL-HAB'SA, or TEL-HARE'SHA, (a heap of the plough), in Babylonia, a place to which the captive Israelites were carried. Ezra ii. 59.
- TEL-ME'LAH, (heap of salt), in Babylonia, a place to which the Israelites were carried. Ezra ii. 59.
- TE'MA, an Arabian tribe. Gen. xxv. 15.
- TE'MAN, (the south), a city, region, and people in the south of Arabia Petrea, so named from a grandson of Esau. Gen. xxxvi. 11.
- THE'BEZ, a town near Bethshan. Judg. ix. 50. [IV., V.]
- THESSALONICA, a town of Macedonia, now called Salonichi. Acts xvii. 1. [II., VII.]
- THREE TAVERNS, or TRES TABER'NE, a place thirty miles from Rome, containing a celebrated inn, frequented by the higher classes of Romans. Acts xxviii. 15.
- THYAT'IRA, a city on the northern border of Lydia. Acts xvi. 14. [II., VII.]
- TIBE'RIAS, a populous city belonging to Naphtali, on the western side of the Sea of Tiberias, now called Tabariyeh. John vi. 1, 23. [VI., VII., IX.]
- TIBE'RIAS, Sea of. See p. 42. [IX.]
- TIB'HATH, a town in Syria. 1 Chron. xviii. 8.
- TIM'NAH, an Edomitish tribe. Gen. xxxvi. 40. [II., VII.]

- TIM'NATH, a town in Judah. Gen. xxxviii. 12. (Josh. xix. 43, Thimnathah.) [IV., V., VI.]
- TIM'NATH-HE'RES, also called TIM'NATH-SE'RAH, a town assigned to Joshua, near the mountains of Ephraim. Josh. xix. 50. [V.]
- TIPH'SAH, (a passage or ford;) now called ed-Deir, (the convent;) a large city on the Euphrates. 1 Kings iv. 24. [II., V.]
- TIR'AS, a people descended from Japheth. Gen. x. 2.
- TIR'ZAH, a city of Ephraim, and the royal residence of some of the kings of Israel. Josh. xii. 24. [IV., V., VI.]
- TISH'BI, a town in Naphtali. (1 Kings xvii. 1, Tishbite.)
- TOB, a district on the east of the Jordan. Judg. xi. 3.
- TO'CHEN, a town in Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 32.
- TOGAR'MAH, or TOGAR'MUTH, the Hebrew name for Armenia. Gen. x. 3. [I.]
- TO'LAD, a town in Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 29.
- TO'PHEL, a town in Palestine, situation unknown. Deut. i. 1.
- TO'PHETH, (a drum;) a place on the south-east of Jerusalem, in the valley of Hinnom. 2 Kings xxiii. 10. [VIII.]
- TRACHONI'TIS, the district between Anti-Libanus and the Arabian mountains, south of Damascus, and east of Auranitis. Luke iii. 1. [VI.]
- TRO'AS, a city of northern or lesser Mysia, in Asia Minor. Acts xvi. 8. [II., VII.]
- TROGYLIUM, a town and promontory in Asia Minor, opposite Samos. Acts xx. 15. [II., VII.]
- TU'BAL, a people named after their progenitor, a son of Japheth, and supposed to have been settled in Asia Minor, near the Euxine. Isa. lxi. 19. [I.]
- TYRE, a city famed for its antiquity, commerce, and colonies, situated on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean. Josh. xix. 29: 2 Sam. v. 11. [II., IV., V., VI., VII., IX.]
- U'LAI, a river which flowed into the united stream of the Tigris and Euphrates. Dan. viii. 2.
- UM'MAH, a town in Asher. Josh. xix. 30.
- U'PHAZ, the name of a gold country: perhaps a corruption of Ophir. Jer. x. 9.
- UR, (light;) a city near the Euphrates, now called Orfah, or Urfah. Gen. xi. 28. [I.]
- UZ, a region supposed to be situated in the north of Arabia Deserta, between Idumæa, Palestine, and the Euphrates. Job i. 1.
- U'ZAL, a district in Arabia. Gen. x. 27. [I.]
- UZ'ZEN-SHE'RAH. 1 Chron. vii. 24.
- ZA'ANAN, (place of flocks;) a town in Judah, perhaps the same as Zenan. Micah i. 11.
- ZAANAN'NIM, or ZAANA'IM, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33.
- ZA'IR, a place near Edom. 2 Kings viii. 21.
- ZAL'MON, a mountain in Samaria. Judg. ix. 48. ("Salmon," Auth. Vers., Psalm lxxviii. 14, but the same in the Hebrew as Zalmon, or rather Tsalmon.)
- ZALMO'NAH, an Israelitish station. Num. xxxiii. 41. [III.]
- ZAMZUM'IMS, an ancient race of giants, in the country afterward possessed by the Ammonites. Deut. ii. 20. [III.]
- ZANO'AH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 34.
- ZA'PHON, a town in Gad. Josh. xiii. 27.
- ZA'RED, a mountain torrent or water-course, rising in the mountains of Moab. Num. xxi. 12.
- ZAR'EPHATH, (the Sarepta of the New Testament,) 1 Kings xvii. 9. [IV., V.]
- ZAR'ETAN, a town in Manasseh. Josh. iii. 16. (Judg. vii. 22: Zererath;) (1 Kings iv. 12, Zartanah;) (vii. 46, Zarthan;) (xi. 26, Zereda;) (2 Chron. iv. 17, Zeredathah.) [IV.]
- ZA'RETH-SHA'HAR, (the splendor of the dawn;) a village in Reuben. Josh. xiii. 19.
- ZERO'IM, a. one of the cities in the vale of Siddim. Gen. x. 19.—β. a valley and town in the tribe of Benjamin. 1 Sam. xiii. 18.
- ZEB'ULUN, (dwelling;) a. a tribal division of Canaan. Josh. xix. 10–16. [IV.]—β. a border city belonging to Asher and Zebulun. See p. 27. [IV.]
- ZE'DAD, a place on the northern limit of Canaan, in Aram. Num. xxxiv. 8. [V.]
- ZE'LAH, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 28.
- ZEL'ZAH, a town in Benjamin. 1 Sam. x. 2.
- ZEMARA'IM, a town in Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 22.
- ZEM'ARITE, a Canaanitish people. Gen. x. 18.
- ZE'NAN, a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 37.
- ZE'PHATH, a city in southern Palestine. Judg. i. 17.
- ZEPH'ATHAH, a valley, probably near the last-mentioned place. 2 Chron. xiv. 10.
- ZER, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 35.
- ZID'DIM, a town in Naphtali. Josh. xix. 35.
- ZI'DON, or SI'DON, (fishing;) (Heb., Tzidon,) one of the most ancient cities and districts of Phœnicia, situated in the allotment of the tribe of Asher, but never conquered by it. Gen. x. 15, 19: Josh. xix. 24–31. [I., II., III., IV., V., VI., VIII., IX.]
- ZIK'LAG, a city situated in the tribe of Simeon, but at times subject to the Philistines, whose king, Achish, bestowed it on David, after which it pertained to Judah. Josh. xv. 31. [IV.]
- ZIM'RAH, ZIM'RI, an Arabian tribe, named after Keturah's first-born. Gen. xxv. 2.
- ZIN, a wilderness near Kadesh-Barnea. Num. xiii. 22: Josh. xv. 1, 3.
- ZI'ON, the higher and southern hill on which the more ancient part of the city of Jerusalem was built: also called "the city of David," who fixed his residence there. 2 Sam. v. 7. [VIII.]
- ZI'OR, a town in the hilly country of Judah. Josh. xv. 54.
- ZIPH, a. a town in Judah. Josh. xv. 24.—β. a wilderness in the neighborhood of the town. 1 Sam. xxiii. 14. [IV., V., VI.]
- ZI'PHRON. Num. xxxiv. 9.
- ZIZ, a mountain pass. 2 Chron. xx. 16.
- ZO'AN, one of the oldest cities in Lower Egypt. Num. xiii. 22. [II., III.]
- ZO'AR, (little;) a town in the vale of Siddim. Gen. xiii. 10. [IV., VI.]
- ZO'BAH, or A'RAM-ZO'BAH, a Syrian kingdom, extending from the Euphrates westward, per-

- haps as far north as Aleppo. 1 Sam. xiv. 47. [II., V.]
- ZO'HELETH, a stone near Jerusalem. 1 Kings i. 9.
- ZO'PHIM, a plain on Mount Pisgah. Num. xxiii. 14.
- ZO'RAH, or ZORE'AH, a town in Judah. Josh. xv 33. [V.]
- ZUPH, a district near to the land of the Benjamins. 1 Sam. ix. 5.
- ZU'ZIMS, Gen. xiv. 5; by some conjectured to be the same as the Zamzummims.

THE END.

801 103CLB
BR 5581
04/10 32005 Ohio

HF Group

